Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator specify some instance where an ordinance has not been required or has not been passed on a State being admitted?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will specify the State of Wisconsin for one, where the final act of admission, if my recollection is right, provided that the jurisdiction of the people of the United States over certain rivers should be held intact, and that the State of Wisconsin should never undertake to levy any tolls, dues, or other exactions upon the free navigation of those rivers. It was put in as a section by the force of the law of Congress.

My honorable friend from New Jersey [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN] has furnished me with another illustration, and the acts of Congress are full of them in some form or other. He has handed to me the act for the admission of the State of Ohio, which declares, not as part of an ordinance to be submitted to the people of that State, but as a part of the paramount law of the land creating that State: "provided the same," (that is the constitution of Ohio) "shall be republican and not repugnant to the ordinance of the 18th of July, 1787, between the original States and the people and States of the territory northwest of the river Ohio."

But, Mr. President, I need not proceed to give a detailed list of the various acts of Congress in which, when the final act of admission came to be passed, Congress has exerted and exercised the power, paramount and supreme, of declaring in such and such respects as it seemed fit to them the exercise of State sovereignty over a given subject should not prevail. As I said the other day, if we were in a court discussing this question as mere lawyers, I take it it would be difficult for my friend from Iowa, or for any other gentleman learned in the law, to maintain that the power to pass a law did not necessarily include and imply the power to impress such qualifications and conditions upon the operation of that law as to the law-making power should seem fit. It is a proposition which I think I can safely defy any man, however great or learned he is, to take the contrary of.

That being the case, Mr. President, I am not troubled by the doubts which my learned friend from Iowa seems to express. If I were, I would vote cheerfully and gladly with him, because with him I agree that there is no emergency whatever of expediency as it might be called, but it is not expediency—there is no emergency whatever which will justify an American Senator in departing from the true principles of legislation to achieve any temporary object, however necessary and desirable it may be. Thus thinking, I propose to amend the amendment of the Senator from Missouri now pending, by striking it all out and substituting for it this:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise, or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

Mr. GRIMES. I suspect that if the Senator from Vermont had pursued his inquiries a little further and examined the legislative proceedings of the first General Assemblies of those States that were erected from Territories, he would have discovered that in every instance there was an ordinance passed affirming the act of Congress, ratifying and agreeing to the terms imposed upon them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my honorable friend how there could be any act of a State as a State until the State should have been admitted into the Union; and how, therefore, the action of the State afterward, after she had her place, or any failure to act if she failed to act, could affect the validity of the previous act of Congress?

Mr. GRIMES. As I am by birth a Yankee as well as the Senator from Vermont, I will answer his question by asking him another. I will ask him how he expects to get this amendment which he proposes ratified and confirmed unless it is by an act of the first General Assembly of the State of Nebraska, and without that what is the effect of it? I would ask the Senator further how is a man who may be aggrieved by the people of the State of Nebraska not adopting this provision and not agreeing to it to seek his remedy? The Senator will answer me, "in the courts." He told us so the other day. The case is then carried through various courts until it reaches your supreme judicial tribunal here. How that will decide nobody knows. I object to his proposition, because we have the power now to fix this question beyond cavil and doubt, and beyond any possibility of a supreme court or any tribunal deciding against us, and I want to have it thus fixed before it goes out of our hands.

The Senator referred to the act admitting the State of Ohio. Just such a provision as that was incorporated in the act authorizing the admission of the State of Iowa into the Union. That State, which I have the honor in part to represent, was the first State created west of the Mississippi river and north of the Missouri compromise line, and Congress saw fit in its wisdom to declare that that same provision which had been contained in all the organic acts and all the legislation in regard to the Territories that now compose the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin should be extended to us, and when we came into the Union we passed a law ratifying and agreeing to the stipulations that were fixed in that act of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose you should repeal your law?

Mr. GRIMES. If we were to repeal the law, and any persons were aggrieved by that repeal, then they would be in exactly the position in which the colored people would be in Nebraska if the Senator's amendment should be adopted here. They would have to seek their remedy in the judicial tribunals; and how the judicial tribunals may settle the question he does not know and I do not know. But we do know that we have the power to settle it here ourselves while the question is before us, by requiring the people of the Territory to agree to the provisions of the constitution striking out the word "white." But it is proposed that we shall refuse to settle it for ourselves and shall allow it to be sent before a tribunal in which I think that a great many of the people of this country at this moment have not any very great confidence as to the manner in which they will decide questions of this character.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, and also to the substitute offered for it by the Senator from Vermont; and although I have already addressed the Senate on this subject at greater length than I expected to do when the discussion commenced, I shall further ask their indulgence for a few minutes while I state some of the views I entertain. I do not believe that under the Constitution Congress has any authority to impose conditions, in the nature of fundamental conditions, interfering with the political rights and powers of a State, as conditions of the admission of new States. Here is the point I take, and upon this ground I propose to stand, no matter whether the condition may relate to negro suffrage, to white suffrage, to female suffrage, or any matter or thing over which a State in the Union has jurisdiction and control in virtue of its being a State of the Union.

Now, sir, what is the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri? He proposes to add to the very brief bill reported by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories for the admission of Nebraska the following provision:

"That this act shall not take effect"—

That is, that Nebraska shall not be admitted as a State—

"except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color; and upon the further condition that the fundamental condition shall be submitted to the voters of the Territory of Nebraska at an election to be held," &c.

Now, sir, after this contemplated election shall have been held—and I admit the power of Congress to direct such an election to be held, because the people are in a territorial condition and subject to our laws—the mover of this amendment proceeds to say that—

"If a majority of such votes shall be for this condition, the Governor shall certify that fact to the President of the United States, who shall by proclamation announce the fact; whereupon, without further proceeding on the part of Congress, this act shall take effect."

That is to say, upon the vote of a majority of the people of the Territory being obtained in favor of this fundamental condition already mentioned, Nebraska shall be admitted into the Union. Well, sir, suppose she is thus admitted into the Union after such an election, what becomes of the objectionable feature in her constitution declaring that nobody but white persons shall vote? What at that moment is the constitution of Nebraska? Has it been altered or amended by our act? No, sir. The constitution of Nebraska under which she will have been admitted into the Union contains the following clause:

"Every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upward, belonging to either of the following classes, who shall have resided in the State, county, precinct, and ward for the time provided by law shall be an elector, namely, first, white citizens of the United States; second, white persons of foreign birth who shall have declared their intention to become citizens conformable to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization."

These are the classes, and these are the only classes which by the constitution of Nebraska, as it would then stand, are to exercise the privilege of voting at the polls. Now, under this amendment, although the people of Nebraska, by their votes, adopt this so-called fundamental condition and thus agree in their primary capacity, as a Territory, that there shall be no restriction of the right of suffrage on account of race or color, the legal result plainly is, that under the constitution of the State, which by that vote has not been repealed or altered in any of its features, colored persons would not be allowed to vote. So that the amendment would fail of its object entirely.

Again, Mr. President, have we the power under the Constitution to prescribe to a new State such terms as seem to be contemplated in this amendment? I insist that we have not. The whole power of Congress over the subject of the admission of new States is contained in a single clause of the Constitution, declaring that new States may be admitted into this Union. But, says the Senator from Vermont, if Congress have the power of admission, Congress may admit upon conditions. I grant it Congress might affix this condition to an act of admission; that one half of the population of the new State should, before they became a State, visit California or China, or go to London, because until that condition antecedently imposed is complied with the State is not admitted and does not possess the faculties of a State; but after that condition is complied with, then I insist that Congress have no power or authority over the subject of State rights at all. If a State is admitted, as I have said heretofore, it must be admitted upon equal terms with other States. The very term "State" itself implies this political equality. Congress have no power, and no power has ever been claimed on the part of Congress, to interfere with the exercise of those rights which pertain to a State as a political community. If we have no such power, how can we contrive to attain, effectually and practically, the same end by insisting upon a fundamental condition subsequent? Sir, we have no such power. Congress has not received it at the hands of the people of the United States, but, on the other hand, that people have declared expressly in the Constitution that all power not therein delegated is reserved to the States respectively or to the people. Is there any power in the Constitution, express or implied, authorizing Congress to interfere with the domestic rights and privileges of the States of the Union? None whatever; and if they cannot do it directly in the shape of a positive act of Congress after the State is admitted into the Union, I ask you upon what principle of law it is that they may do it indirectly and conditionally in the shape of either of these amendments?

If we may undertake in this way to regulate suffrage in the State of Nebraska we may for the same reason, and no other reason, go still further; we may undertake to enact in our law authorizing the admission of this Territory as a State what sort of judiciary shall be organized there; we may descend to the small business of regulating the descent of property, the distribution of estates, the mode of collecting debts, the right of inheritance and of making wills, the marital rights; indeed, all the other rights which every State exercises in virtue of its sovereign power as a State, no matter what that right may be. No, sir; this principle will not bear examination, and Congress has never attempted in any essential respect to impose any such condition upon the new States, interfering with their acknowledged political powers.

The honorable Senator from Missouri, when he spoke in advocacy of his amendment, referred to the act enabling the people of Missouri to form a State constitution. It is but a recital of the provisions contained in almost every act for the admission of new States. It is not a condition, it is a positive enactment and provision of the statute; it reads as follows:

"Provided, that the same"—

That is the constitution of Missouri—

"whenever formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States; and that the Legislature of said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the titles of such soil to bona fide purchasers; and that no tax shall be imposed on lands, the property of the United States, and in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

These are the stereotyped provisions upon which most of the new States have been admitted. Allow me to say one word upon these provisions, sometimes called conditions. The first is that the constitution shall be republican. Is that of any use? Is such a provision of any benefit or any binding force? When the State calls a convention and frames a constitution it does not become the constitution of the State until laid before Congress, and until Congress has passed its judgment and decided whether it be or be not republican.

The second provision is, that the State Legislature shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil of the United States. This provision is inserted from abundant caution. There were at the commencement of the Government some persons who contended for State rights so strongly as to take the ground that a State, after having been admitted into the Union, might lawfully interfere with the right of disposal of the soil by Congress. In other words, that all the public lands lying within the limits of a new State became by the very act of admission the property of the State itself. That doctrine, however, is plainly inconsistent with the Constitution and the rights of the United States. No State, new or old, is competent to interfere with the primary disposal of the soil of the United States. The United States is the owner of land within the limits of new States. Of course, if it is the owner of land, it has the right not only of jurisdiction, if it sees fit to exercise it, but the right of disposition also. It holds it as owner by virtue of its sovereign power as a Government, and a State cannot interfere with that ownership, so that that condition is but formal and nugatory.

The next provision is, that "no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States." Certainly no gentleman will pretend that there is any force or efficacy in this provision, for the reason that the property of the United States cannot be taxed by the State governments, a principle which has been decided repeatedly by the Supreme Court.

The only remaining clause which I think deserves any comment is the last, and is as follows: "In no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents." I do not believe that this clause is constitutional or valid, because it is undoubtedly the right of every State, in the exercise of its legislative power, should it see fit to do such an act of inequality and injustice, to make taxation unequal. Every State Legislature has full and unlimited scope and power over the subject of the taxation of property within its limits, and unless restrained by its constitution may impose unequal taxes and higher taxes upon the property of a non-resident than upon that of a resident. It grows out of the sovereign power of the State over this particular subject of taxation, and the Legislature is responsible only to its constituents for the exercise of the power.

Now, sir, I oppose both these amendments, because I think I discover in them the inauguration of a policy in regard to new States upon which we can never stand. If the old States represented in Congress have the right to impose conditions limiting and restricting the sovereign power of the new States after their admission into the Union, how long will it be before the representatives of the old States, for their own advantage—because they can plead no exemption from the frailties of human nature—will lay prostrate every new State at their feet and make them no better than hewers of wood and drawers of water to the States which happen to be in the Union? No, sir; let us embark in no such experiment, either in regard to suffrage or to any other matter over which a State Legislature has confessedly full and ample control.

I am not prepared to assert here in my seat that Congress have the power to say to the Territory of Colorado or to any other Territory applying for admission as a State, "We have a right to declare what sort of institutions of learning shall be established in your State; we have a right to declare where you shall trade and for what price you shall sell your commodities." I have no idea of entering upon this terra incognita of experimental legislation; and I am content to vote for the admission of Nebraska as one of the States of the Union, and am confident that she will do right on the subject of negro suffrage, just as confident as I am that the present States will correct any errors which they may have committed in this regard, if they be errors. It is enough for me to insist, as I do insist, that Congress have no power to annex this fundamental condition to the admission of the people of Nebraska or of any other Territory as a State. We have not the power; it is withheld from us, and very wisely withheld from us. I shall therefore vote against both the amendments, and hope the bill may be passed in its naked form as it was reported from the Committee on Territories.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am in favor of the admission of Nebraska, pure and simple, without conditions or qualifications. I favored it at the last session of Congress, and I favored it at this session, because I believe that under the previous practice of our Government Nebraska is entitled to admission. I believe that the admission of the State will be a benefit to the people of that Territory and thus to the people of the whole country. I believe I am doing the best thing I can for the people of that Territory in voting for her admission as a State. It adds to my pleasure in doing this, that by doing it I can do two other good things, as I believe them to be: I can add to the strength of what I believe to be sound public sentiment in this Chamber, legitimately and fairly, and I can add also legitimately and fairly, as I believe, to the strength and influence in this Chamber and elsewhere of that part of the country in which I live.

But it is said that we ought not to do this thing because we voted a few days ago and yesterday in a particular way touching the condition of affairs in this District. I cannot see the force of that reasoning. The Constitution of the United States confers upon us the government of this District, and in passing the suffrage bill for this District we did what we believed to be for the best interests of the District. I never believed that this District was created and the control of it given to us for the purpose of making it an instrument on which to try experimental legislation. In the State where I live there are a great many people who believe that the prohibition of the sale of ardent spirits is just as important as the giving of suffrage to the blacks in that State. Suppose that we here, in legislating for this District, should deem it to be important to prohibit the sale of ardent spirits in the District, would that become a rule by which we should be open to act when legislating for all the Territories and for the admission of new States? I cannot look upon it so. One third of the population of this District consists of colored people, many of them wealthy, paying taxes; they were liable to be oppressed and injured in their property, perhaps in their lives, by the white people of this District, and therefore it was deemed best to give them the suffrage. I voted for it cordially and cheerfully; but I shall not be at all embarrassed by that vote in any future action I may take in regard to any other locality where a different state of affairs obtains.

Again, it is said that we must reject Nebraska because the constitution she presents to us is not republican in form. I confess I cannot so understand it. It strikes me that, in view of our past history, that statement is absurd. I think I am right in saying that there has been no new State admitted into this Union since its formation, except Vermont and perhaps Maine, in whose constitution this particular exclusion of colored men from voting has not been inserted. I think the constitution of every one of the new States, except Vermont and perhaps Maine, has contained this identical provision. Twenty of the twenty-six States now composing this Union have the same provision. Did not the men who preceded us understand whether a constitution was republican in form or not? Why did they admit Ohio, or Indiana, or Illinois, or Michigan, or Wisconsin, or Minnesota, or Iowa, if they had not republican constitutions? It is said we are bound to exclude Nebraska because we are required to guaranty to each State a republican form of government. We have the power to do that thing, and if the States I have named are not republican in form, why do we not go to work and guaranty republican governments to States that already have provisions of this kind in their constitutions? I should be glad to know. Why is not a provision brought in here to guaranty to Indiana a republican form of government if she has not one to-day? Why is it not done? Why do not you require us in Iowa to make our constitution republican in form? You have power to guaranty to us a republican form of government. You say we have not a republican form of government; why do not you give us one? Why not? I do not know.

Again, it is said that we may be embarrassed when we come to act in regard to the lately rebellious States. Now, sir, I am free to say that when we come to act upon that subject I shall be prepared, not only to give the ballot to every black man there if it be necessary, but I shall be prepared to exclude from the ballot very many white men there, and I shall not be at all embarrassed in doing so by the vote I shall give upon Nebraska. What is the condition of affairs in those States? What must we do? What must we secure in those States? We must secure the control of those governments in the hands of loyal men. That is one thing we must do. What else must we do? We must see to it that men who have been on our side through this war are protected there in person, in property, in life, in liberty. That we must do. Now, if to do these two things, or either one of them, it is necessary to give to every black man in those States the ballot, I will give it to him. If to do both of these things, or either one of them, it is necessary to exclude four fifths of the white men there, I will do that thing. I shall not be at all embarrassed by the vote I shall give in favor of Nebraska in doing either one or the other of those things. Does the same condition of things obtain in Nebraska I should like to know? Is there any danger that that State will pass into the hands of rebels and traitors? Her sons fought side by side with the sons of Iowa all through this rebellion, for our flag, and not for the rebel flag. The men of Iowa went to Nebraska, and the men of Nebraska came to Iowa, and they fought side by side through this war, with equal bravery, and equally well.

Besides, is there any danger that the rights, the liberties, the property of the loyal men in Nebraska will be hazarded by giving this constitution to the people of that State? No sir; and I cannot stand, and I will not stand here throwing in the teeth of the people of Nebraska the foul insult, as I consider it to be, that they must be treated in a certain way because forsooth we must treat men who live in South Carolina in a certain way! They do not stand upon the same plane. They do not stand in the same condition. What may be necessary for one may not be necessary for the other.

For these reasons, sir, I shall vote for the bill as it came from the chairman of the Committee on Territories. If the sense of the Senate be that either one of these amendments ought to be added to it, I shall still vote for the bill; but I cannot vote for either one or the other of the amendments.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I do not propose to argue this question over again, because it has been so thoroughly investigated and debated on both the bills for the admission of Nebraska and Colorado that it seems to me scarcely possible for anybody to say anything new on the subject. Indeed I have hardly heard a word in this debate which was not put forth on several other occasions. The Senate, by a very large majority, passed their judgment two or three times upon this and a kindred question; and I have not the vanity to believe that if I were to oppose that deliberate judgment of the Senate I should have eloquence enough or influence enough to overturn and reverse it. I was therefore in hopes that when this bill again came up for the decision of the Senate this year, before identically the same members who passed upon it at a prior period, we should not have to waste so much time—no, I will not say waste, but take so much time for its consideration.

But, sir, there were some things said by the Senator from Massachusetts to which I feel bound to reply in some measure, though not at length. He called this a rebel State and a rebel constitution—

Mr. CRESWELL. No, he read from a letter in which that statement was made.

Mr. WADE. Perhaps he read it from a letter. I heard those words and supposed they were his own, or if they were not his own that he adopted them by making use of them in the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Those words were in a letter from a citizen of Nebraska which I read, directed against the admission of the State at this moment.

Mr. WADE. I did not see the gentleman when he was making use of these observations, but I was very sure that I heard this language repeated once or twice, "the rebel constitution of Nebraska."

Mr. SUMNER. I did not use that language myself.

Mr. WADE. I suppose not. I should think nobody here could use it, because this is one of the most republican and equitable constitutions that I ever read with the exception of this provision on the single question here in controversy. I am told and believe that it was copied almost literally from the constitution of Wisconsin. The draughtsman of it took that constitution, as I am informed, as the guide and copied its language and provisions into this, so that the two are almost identical.

The Senator read, or said without reading, that this constitution was made by the enemies of the Government, by Copperheads, or something like that.

Mr. SUMNER. I read that from a letter; I made no such statement myself.

Mr. WADE. Then I want to contradict the impression sought to be made by the letter you read; and if you dissented from the sentiment of the letter you ought not to have read it; or if you did read it you should have told us that you utterly dissented from it. That course would have relieved me from the necessity of making any observations on it. The fact, as I am informed, and do not doubt, is that all the Republican members of the Legislature voted for this constitution unanimously, and only five of what are called the Copperhead party and all the rest of that party voted against it. That is the way this constitution comes here, by the will of our friends, those who act with us, those who are Republicans, those who fought with us during the war; and it was opposed by the Democrats who favored the cause of the enemy. Therefore it has a very good parentage; it comes from a very respectable source; or at all events we ought to consider it so, for it comes from the hands of gentlemen holding the same doctrines that we hold, endeavoring to establish the same principles that we undertake to establish. But it was made at a time when this particular question had not been so much agitated as it has been now. Perhaps there was some little controversy on the subject when this constitution was adopted, but the attention of the Legislature does not seem to have been called to it particularly. They seem to have followed the usual form. Congress itself, in the enabling act, had not called any attention to it. That bill passed here, I believe, without the criticism of anybody, without the opposition of anybody so far as I can remember. All seemed to be agreed that these people might come into the Union upon the same terms that other States had formerly come in.

Mr. SUMNER. Will my friend allow me to remind him there that he is a little in error. There was this new condition inserted for the first time on this occasion, that their constitution should not be repugnant to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. I voted for that myself.

Mr. WADE. Very well; I believe that it is not repugnant to the principles of the Declaration of Independence as understood at all times since that instrument was made. The contemporaneous construction of it, that which has been followed by courts and public men and Legislatures in all the States, and by Congress, has been the construction which the makers of this constitution followed. If they erred, they erred in company with all the statesmen who had preceded them. It was never before supposed that a State was not republican because it excluded certain classes from the right to vote.

Mr. SUMNER. My friend does not seem to be aware of the new words that were introduced in this enabling act; they were not words requiring a republican government, but requiring that the constitution should not be repugnant to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. These words were introduced for the first time, as I understand, in the enabling act for Nebraska, and I think also for Colorado.

Mr. WADE. I do not know whether this was so or not; but I suppose there never was a constitution that was framed for our approval that was not supposed by Congress, when they acted upon it, to be in conformity with the Constitution of the United States and with their understanding of the Declaration of Independence. I do not believe any man has ever voted for the adoption of a constitution for a State when he believed that it conflicted with the principles of those great fundamental instruments. I never did, and I do not think anybody ever did. I do not think those words, if they were inserted for the first time in this enabling act, meant any more than the act would have meant if they had not been inserted. They were a caution to us not to violate this instrument, and to legislate as all our predecessors had heretofore legislated upon this subject. I do not deny that I should like the constitutions of Nebraska and Colorado better if they contained no such exclusion as the Senator speaks of; but nevertheless, when he talks of their not being in conformity to the Constitution of the United States, because they are not republican in form, I must say that, if that be so, I do not know of any State constitution that is republican. Is it any more anti-republican to exclude the colored people than it is to exclude all the female portion of your population? When you come to make exclusion a test, you cannot get a republican constitution anywhere. Has not a female this inalienable right that you talk about, and is it not tyranny and anti-republican, and everything that is bad and abominable, to deny the suffrage to all females? How do you exclude one half of your population without a thought to the contrary, and then insist that such a constitution will be made all right and republican by letting in a few colored voters? Your test will not bear scrutiny; such a test of republicanism will not answer.

I suppose that the constitution here proposed is, according to the ideas of American statesmen, republican in form, and I believe so because it has the sanction of all those who have gone before us; because no one heretofore has ever questioned the republicanism of a constitution like this.

I wish now to say a word about the insinuations which have been made by the Senator from Massachusetts against my position, as though I had changed it in some way. Sir, it would be exceedingly strange if a man, after having been as long in the councils of the nation as I have been, after having gone through such a terrible warfare—for I have seen nothing else since I have been in Congress for sixteen years past—after having battled for equal rights to the utmost of my capacity during the whole period, should all at once, without any motive in God's earth, change round and desert all those principles. That is the insinuation. Let it go for what it is worth.

Sir, I have some little confidence in the people of Nebraska and Colorado; the Senator has none. He says that I spoke of the lenity which ought to be extended to these people. I said no such thing. Lenity is not the word. They ask for no lenity. They only ask to be permitted to do that which you told them they might do. You said to them that if they would form a constitution as other States had done, and come here and present it, they should be admitted just as the other States had been. That is all they ask of you. They ask not a particle of lenity. I would not extend any lenity to anybody where a principle was at stake. They barely ask you to live up to the agreement you made. You say, however, that they did not perform it on their part, and thus you undertake to escape it. How was that? You fixed a certain day when they should meet and perform their part of the agreement. They did not meet on that day, but they met on another day, and did substantially what you asked of them. That was not a difference which was any departure in substance from your enabling act. It was the mere ghost of a form which they violated. It was inconvenient for them to effect what was desired on the very day named. It was not named as a condition, on failure to comply with which their action should be void; but it was merely a direction by Congress that the thing should be done on or about such a time, the particular day not being important. It was a bare direction; not a condition-precedent. Now, you undertake to give the narrow construction that it failed altogether, because action was not had on the particular day named. I doubt whether ever a constitution was formed on the very day named by Congress. But these technicalities, these mere ghosts that you interpose between these people and the rights you have awarded to others, it seems to me, are not statesmanlike. If you were defending a man on an indictment for murder such a shadow would hardly avail him; and yet as a statesman you object to the formation of a State constitution that is good in all other respects, because it was not made on the very day that Congress said the people might make it. I do not think that is good logic or good law.

Now, Mr. President, why is it that I stand here the advocate for the admission of this State into the Union when I have, as the Senator says, been generally the advocate of equal rights, and have insisted very much on justice? I will tell the Senator that it is because, when I consider the condition in which the country is, and when I look to the terrible conflict that lies right ahead of us, I feel disposed to arm myself and be equipped with all the forces that are legitimately within my power. The Senator from Wisconsin said yesterday that he once voted for the admission of this State, because he thought we wanted to be reinforced by the principles that these men knocking at your doors are actuated by, as helpmates to carry out the great doctrines that we are endeavoring to establish. Sir, it was a good idea. Now he says, however, that the clouds have passed by and all is fair weather, and there will be in the future no necessity for any reinforcements.

Mr. HOWE. Permit me to say to the Senator that I did not admit that I was seeking for reinforcements of principles. I acknowledged that I was seeking for reinforcements of votes to enforce those principles; but I said that we had got votes enough now.

Mr. WADE. I think I did not misapprehend the gentleman. He did not want any new principle, but he wanted forces sufficient to carry our principles out against all opposition. So do I; but how he could come to the conclusion that we shall not want any reinforcements I am unable to say. When he gave the vote to which he referred, had the Supreme Court of the United States made a decision which lets loose upon all the Union men of the South the bloodhounds of those rebellious, unrestricted States, and denies the right of the military power to protect them? Did he know then that two of the departments of this Government, or perhaps, more properly speaking, one of its departments and the executive branch of the whole, had turned in with the adversary and were ready now to abet his cause? I tell you, sir, you want reinforcements, in prospect too, such as you ever did, to establish and carry out your principles.

Mr. HOWE. I beg leave to say that at the time I cast that vote in favor of the admission of Colorado the Supreme Court had not made any such decision as is referred to by the Senator from Ohio. I beg leave to say further, however, that in spite of any decision that the Supreme Court has made, if bloodhounds have any of our friends by the throat in any of these lately rebellious communities, and still rebellious communities, the fault is with the Congress of the United States, and not with the Supreme Court, because there are here in both these Houses duly accredited representatives of the loyal party of the nation, sufficient, in spite of the President and in spite of the Supreme Court, to place over all our friends in every one of those communities a government springing from this authority, responsible to this authority and to this authority alone.

Mr. WADE. Very well, suppose that is so, there are enough in numbers; but yet you are in default. I want to reinforce you with some that will make no default; I want to bring you soldiers that will not shrink from any responsibility; and such are knocking at your doors to-day. They are not the limping sort that will leave your friends in peril. If Congress is delinquent, it is because you have not these reinforcements that I want to bring here. If the Senator from Wisconsin stood by his original reasoning and found Congress not sufficient in courage, in nerve, in resolution to do that which they ought to do for the protection of their friends in the southern States, he ought to be as eager to reinforce them by proper soldiery, if I may so speak, as he was when he gave his former vote.

Mr. HOWE. If my friend will indulge me in one more word I shall be glad to say that when he was talking of reinforcements I supposed he was talking of the expediency of adding to our numbers more of the same kind.

Mr. WADE. Not at all.

Mr. HOWE. If he means to say that here is an opportunity to bring in some men of a better kind, that is a new proposition, and it is one that I have not yet considered fully, and I do not know exactly upon what evidence to determine that question if I am called upon to consider it.

Mr. WADE. I determine it upon the evidence the gentleman himself presents. I did not say that Congress were insufficient to the duties we were called upon to perform; but when I stated that the executive officer of the United States and a coördinate branch of the Government had departed from us, the Senator got up and told us that they were not to blame, but that the trouble was in our own body, not being sufficient to give that protection which the time and the occasion required. So he furnished me the evidence; it is not my assertion, but his. If he is right in what he has said, we certainly do want reinforcements of a different character from somebody that is here.

I do not accuse anybody, but I take the Senator at what he himself has put forth. I do not know of any such men here who are deficient in the way he seems to suppose; I do not believe that we have them, for I am disposed to believe that the difficulty rests with others and not with us; although I believe that, by a bold, determined performance of our duty, we have the remedy in our own hands still; and I want to make sure that, if the remedy must be here, we shall have force enough to look down all opposition and see to it that there shall be no doubt that the Republic shall stand unharmed. I will not say that our force to guard these principles is sufficient when, upon the good old doctrines upon which we have always acted, I can immensely reinforce this body. I will leave nothing to doubt that I can make certain in this emergency. I think it is the business of the statesman to overlook these little small technicalities which gentlemen argue about in this body. They make a great fuss about the word "white" in a constitution of a State where there are no blacks—where the question is a simple abstraction. I should be glad to see this difference smoothed down as well as any one; but I will not sacrifice this Republic to the ghost of a technicality, when, by following the track beaten by our forefathers from the origin of the Government to this time, we can do an act which will be so beneficial in its results. I think that, when I stand on that ground in demanding this reinforcement I am on a pretty solid foundation.

Now, Mr. President, I think that a little confidence, not lenity, is due to the people of Nebraska. You are not at liberty to suppose that, even if you give them the power, they will act the tyrant. That has not been their habit; that has not been their conduct. They fought the common enemy side by side with us, and, according to their numbers, I am told and believe that no State in this Union furnished a larger proportion of efficient soldiery for the great cause of the war than did the Nebraskians, who some seemed to suppose are going to act the tyrant if you give them the power of a State. Sir, if the specimens of men whom they have sent here to represent them be a true criterion by which to judge of their merits, you are most uncharitable when you suggest that if these men have the right to exclude the blacks from the ballot they will do it. I tell you nay, sir. The road to universal freedom and equality is in elevating these just men and placing them in positions where they can exert influence against this evil of which you complain. I tell you that you will reach universal suffrage quicker through this magistracy being admitted here than you will by the rejection or the alteration of the constitution which Nebraska has presented. For this reason, without remitting one jot or tittle of all the vigilance and power that I could ever exert in favor of human rights, I go beyond technicalities on this occasion, and I look to the great events that may be before us. I know, and feel assured, that the way to equality for the few blacks there may be in Nebraska will be hewed out quicker by the admission of the State than by its exclusion. If, after all the expense and trouble these people have been at to comply with your own terms, you turn the cold shoulder upon them and throw them back, I do not know what the consequence may be. I do not doubt, however, that that same patriotism for which they have always stood conspicuous would overcome any feeling of resentment at your intolerance, and that they would still be as patriotic as ever, but I do not like to put human nature to this test. They have done all that you asked of them; they have come nobly up and agreed to relieve you from the burden of their government, asking that they may have it in their own hands, to mold and modify their own institutions in a way that we cannot understand here.

You all know how eager every territorial community is to become a State. Why is it? It is because when we at a great distance undertake to rule them we cannot understand their wants as they understand them themselves. There are a thousand things necessary in a new State just coming into existence, thousands of cares and troubles to be relieved, that we of the old States at a great distance off do not take the same view of that they do. In other words, they can better govern themselves than we can govern them. The people of Nebraska wish to take the burden of a State government upon themselves and relieve us from it. They have shown themselves perfectly able and capable to do it. They are rich enough; they have the power to do it; they have the will to do it; and why should we wish to retain a jurisdiction over them at great expense and trouble to ourselves, when they can better conduct their own affairs in their own way?

It is for these reasons that I favor their admission, and not because I am opposed to colored suffrage. I am as much in favor of colored suffrage as the Senator from Massachusetts or anybody else; but I do not believe the narrow view which he has taken upon this great subject will result in that meed of liberty and equality to the black man that the course which I pursue will in my judgment secure. Of course I judge only for myself; but such has been the judgment of a large majority of the Senate upon deliberation. I know well that those members of this body who have constantly voted for the admission of Colorado and Nebraska have done so with no desire to repudiate the great principles of universal equality. There are no stronger sticklers for this great right than this majority who have voted over and over again for the admission of these States. Shall they be branded as men who have abandoned the principle of equality, and shall it be said that they are not up to the elevated position to which we seek to bring the nation up?

Sir, such a judgment will not stand before the American people, and your cause would be most hopeless if the views of the majority were as illiberal as these arguments would seem to persuade us that they were. Sir, I should have little hope if I judged this majority as some of the minority judge them; but, in my judgment, the rights of the colored people and the rights of all men are as safe in the hands of the majority who have voted for the admission of these States as with any men on God's earth. They are gentlemen of intelligence, gentlemen of great experience in statesmanship, who have had their minds turned to this subject for a great while; and they vote to admit these States into the Union. Is it therefore to be said that they have abandoned their principles? The idea is ridiculous. They judge as I do that the true course is to fortify ourselves by the power of these Territories, and to elevate their magistracy so that their influence shall be potential at home to do away with the ghost of an objection raised here, and I know the object will be accomplished in that way more quickly than in any other.

A word now as to this amendment. When the question was argued on a former occasion, I did not anticipate that any such amendment would be offered. It took me entirely by surprise when it was first presented, and I had to marshal such views of the law as I could on the spur of that occasion, without reverting to any authorities, or even to the precedents formed by the constant legislation of this country. It struck me at the time that it could not be well maintained as a constitutional provision, and I did argue that I thought it would be a restriction on these States which was applied to no other States, and that, therefore, it could not be done. That was just a dictum without reflection, on the spur of the occasion. I confess that when the books are produced; when the constant practice of this Government is brought here on the floor of the Senate and all in accordance with the view taken by the Senator from Vermont, it is impossible for me to believe that the constant practice of the Government from the earliest period was unconstitutional and wrong. It does not differ at all that I can see from the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. I am compelled, therefore, to believe that we may safely ingraft a condition upon the admission of these States just such as we all would wish, and, as I believe, without violation of the Constitution. I yield the loose opinion that I gave when the question first came up, as the authorities that have been produced, and the practice of the Government from the earliest times, are against it. Believing the thing can be done, no man is more zealous that it should be than am I. I should like to see it done, and, therefore, unless authorities and law can be brought here in support of an opposing doctrine, so as to convince me that the Constitution is involved in it, I shall vote for that amendment, and hope it will be carried, and made a part and parcel of the constitution, or, whether it is made part of the constitution or not, a valid condition on which they shall be admitted. They will not complain of it. I know very well, as a matter of fact, as I suppose everybody does, that the question never will be tested by that people, who are now as much in favor of equal suffrage, I presume, as we are, or anybody else.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to say one word just at this point in the honorable Senator's argument. I wish to ask him whether he believes it to be a constitutional principle that Congress may insert such an amendment as has been offered by the Senator from Vermont, that is to say, a perpetual condition restraining the people of the State of Nebraska, after she has been admitted into the Union, from regulating the suffrage of her people? I admit that a condition precedent may be enacted, but not one which is to have an ex post facto operation.

Mr. WADE. That was my trouble before, Mr. President. I do not believe we can make or adopt any constitution for them which the people of Nebraska may not change if they call a convention and see fit to do it. I think, however, that the condition mentioned in the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont would be just as valid and irrevocable as any other part and parcel of that constitution; for if the suffrage had not been limited to white persons, does the Senator contend that the State, after you had admitted her, could not call a convention and restrict it to white persons or females or anybody else? It is just as strong, as valid, and as certain as any other provision in the constitution in my judgment.

Mr. HOWARD. I infer from the honorable gentleman's remarks that he thinks this is not a perpetual condition, and that the people of the State, after they have become a State under their constitution may repeal it and set it aside. That is by no means the idea of the honorable Senator from Vermont. He insists, as he expresses it in his amendment, that this restriction shall be perpetual and fundamental.

Mr. WADE. That language is well enough in an instrument of this kind, but I suppose, as a matter of fact, like any other provision in their constitution, which is not a matter of compact between the Government of the United States and the State, they may call a convention and change it. They may change any clause of their constitution they please, provided they do not make it anti-republican, and this among the rest. While I contend that it is just as valid and as lasting and everlasting as any other provision of their constitution, still the whole of it is subject to modification and change like everything else, at the will of the majority of that people changing their constitution.

Mr. HOWARD. If the gentleman will pardon me, let me call his attention to another clause in the amendment which he promises to vote for:

And if any person or persons shall, contrary to this section, in any manner abridge or prevent the exercise of such right—

Mr. WADE. That is not in the amendment now, and is no part of it. It has been modified by leaving that out.

Mr. HOWARD. I was not aware of that. Then let me say another word. The gentleman from Vermont treats this as a convention, as a compact between the people of the State of Nebraska and Congress, never to be repealed, altered, or revoked at all without the consent, of course, of both the parties to this fundamental compact. Such was the explanation he gave other day, if I recollect aright.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Michigan does not state my position correctly by any means. I treated it as a law of the United States which Congress passes under the Constitution authorizing it to pass the law, and being thus passed, it is the paramount law of the land, above the constitution of Nebraska, or above any act which her people can affect or change. It may be also, in addition to that, in a certain, limited, and technical sense, in the nature of a compact, just as an ordinary charter of incorporation to a private corporation is, in a certain sense, a compact when they accept that charter and act upon it. But so far as any force or power that we have over it is concerned, I contend that we derive it from our constitutional power to pass the law, and it being a law, the constitution of Nebraska, the action of its people, has no effect upon it whatever. That, therefore, Mr. President, is the quality which, in my mind, gives it the superiority that I think it has over any other mode of treating this subject, because if you introduce it by compact into the constitution of Nebraska, then it becomes, so far as it is part of that constitution, merely the constitution of that people, and whenever you can get a majority of that people to alter that constitution, so far as it is their constitution it no longer exists; but I have yet to learn from the superior learning of my friend from Michigan that it is in the power of the people of any State to change an act of Congress passed as the law of the whole land under our supreme authority.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose that, instead of this being a statute of the United States securing the right of suffrage to the colored population, it were a high congressional statute, emanating from the sovereign power of the United States, declaring that in the State of Nebraska property, real and personal, should not descend to heirs-at-law at all, but that, on the death of the owner, following out the suggestion of Mr. Jefferson in his boyhood days, it should escheat to the State; would it be competent for the Legislature of the State to pass an act in the teeth of that congressional statute directing that the property should descend to the heirs-at-law? And if it would be competent for them to do it, upon what ground can the Senator from Vermont uphold the supremacy of this congressional statute of his in relation to the right of suffrage, because the political power of the State over both subjects is precisely the same—the sovereign power of the State as a State?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will answer my friend. I say it would not be competent for the Legislature of Nebraska to interfere at all with that law; and the only reason why we do not insert such a principle into the act of admission is because it does not commend itself to our sense of fundamental justice and right. That is the reason. I admit that we have the perfect right to impress any condition that we please when we create a State, which is nothing but a political corporation. We can give it just such a life as we choose to give it. If it does not choose to live under that law, let it stay dead. If it does not choose to accept that life and act upon it, then it only acts upon it under the law of the life we have impressed upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. Then the argument leads directly to this conclusion, and it is irresistible and unavoidable, that in reference to the new States that are to come into this Union hereafter, Congress is clothed with omnipotent, despotic power over everything, no matter what it may be, which has heretofore been regarded as subject only to the power of a State. Sir, tell me not that this is not a despotic doctrine; tell me not that the new States of the far West will agree to it. Sir, I am astonished—I say it, of course, with great respect to the Senator from Vermont—to hear a doctrine so tyrannical and despotic advocated upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, all power to make law is despotic, because it is the power to impress the will of the law-maker upon whoever may happen to be the subject of it, and a republican power, unless it be wisely exercised for the equal protection of law, without respect to race or color, is just as despotic as if it were exercised by a single sovereign. The phantom, therefore, of despotic power which we are to exercise has no terrors for me at all. The reason why we do not exercise all legislative power for the Territories is because, consistently with our notions of appropriate democratic government, it is fit to leave to the people of the Territories the regulation of their ordinary internal affairs in their own way; but we have thought it fit for many years, in the regulation of the Territories, to declare that their internal regulations should be equal with respect to each other. We have thought it fit to declare that there shall no more be involuntary servitude except for crime. We have not chosen to leave it to the people of the Territories to declare that half of them, because they differ from them in the color of their skin, should be the hewers of wood and drawers of water for the white men; and the reason why we have exercised that power which the gentleman calls despotic is because, as representing the public will of the nation, whose citizens the people of the Territories are as well as the people of the States, we have thought that it was a fundamental wrong; while no mere majority of a section should impose upon the minority of that section. Now the question returns, whether this right to vote among men of equal conditions in every respect except color, among citizens equally citizens of the United States in this Territory, is one of those fundamental regulations in which there ought to be equality. That is the question. We may safely leave to the people of a new State which we create, or to the people of a Territory, the right to regulate the descent and distribution of real estate so long as the people of that State or Territory regulate it, so that it operates equally upon the black man and the white man, upon the woman and the child.

Mr. HOWARD. Where do we get the power to leave it to them?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We get the power to leave it to them under the same Constitution under which we get the power to create the State. We may endow them, as I said before, with precisely the faculties that it pleases our supreme will to give them, and our supreme will is only controlled by that high sense of political justice and equality which ought to be inborn in the breast of every American Senator, if not every American citizen. That is where we get the power. The confusion in the mind of my friend—and it is rare that there ever is any confusion in his mind—grows out of his not paying attention to the distinction between the faculties and the powers which may be exercised by a political or any other corporation after we have granted them their charter, and fixed the law of their existence, and while we are in the act of fixing it. Take a bank, if you please. We incorporate a bank. We clothe it with certain functions and faculties which are contained in its charter. We may fix those faculties and functions at any point we please, as it commends itself to our prudence and policy. Once granted, unless we reserve the express right of amendment or repeal, it has passed upon our faith and by the law beyond our control, and we have then no right further to interfere with it. Therefore it is that we have no right in the State of Michigan or the State of Iowa to declare that black men shall vote against the wishes of the majority of their fellow-citizens who are white. We have not the power—I admit it—because when we gave them their creative existence, when we breathed into them the breath of life, we left it to the white men there to say how that thing should be.

But now, when the people of Nebraska, as they are called—not the black people, I take it, but the people of Nebraska, as they are called—come here with a constitution which excludes from the right of voting a portion of their own fellow-citizens, who have had no voice in the question of whether they should be excluded or not, I am not to be told that I am merely fighting a shadow because there happen to be only a few of them. There will be little value indeed in any Government if the rights of men are to depend upon how small the minority happens to be to-day who are to be affected by an unequal or an unjust distinction. I believe, if my memory serves me right—and the Senator will correct me if I am wrong—it was only one citizen of the mighty empire of Rome who defended himself by the proclamation that he was a Roman citizen. The whole power of the State in every Government that deserves the name protects the rights of the last man as well as it does, and equally with the rights of the majority; Government is not worth a straw otherwise.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask my friend from Vermont a question. He knows very well that I agree with him in not only what he has been saying, but with reference to the leading idea of his amendment. I wish, however, to ask him a question to resolve a doubt of mine, a difficulty in my own mind. His proposition to say that this State, if it comes in, shall only come with this fundamental provision that they shall do so and so, is, to a certain extent, overruling their constitution. They come here with a constitution; that provision is not in it; something is in it entirely at war with that provision. Now he says: "You may come in as a State, but when you come as a State, that provision of your constitution shall be of no effect whatever; we so provide, and you must so understand it." I agree with him that if, after that, they, by any action which can be called State action, agree to it and say that it is satisfactory to them so to come in, it will have all the binding force of law; but the Senator will see that he cannot compel a State to come into the Union with any provision that they have not adopted. The question therefore is, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, what will be effected? If Nebraska had not already elected its Senators and its Representatives under the Constitution, but was to act upon that subject, and we should provide that they might become a part of the Union but with this fundamental condition, and they should then elect Senators and Representatives and send them here to their seats, that, undoubtedly, would be considered an adoption of it; they would agree to the condition; they would agree to what we impose upon them. But, as I understand it, they have already elected Senators and a Representative. The practice of electing Senators and Representatives before a State is admitted is a very bad one, and it ought not to be countenanced; but they have done so. Now, suppose we pass this bill with the Senator's amendment, and thereupon, as soon as it is passed, without the question going back to Nebraska in any shape, to the Legislature or the people in any way whatever, these gentlemen choose to take the oaths and take their seats; have they any power to agree to this condition which is imposed upon them? May not the people of Nebraska turn around and say, "We do not choose to come in under those circumstances, and this action of these gentlemen whom we elected under a different provision does not bind us at all?" Is there, in other words, that kind of action, that kind of adoption of what may be called an amended constitution, that would be held, under those circumstances, as a sufficient adoption of it to make it binding in its effect upon the State? Otherwise, if not, we have imposed this condition and we have admitted Senators and Representatives from that State, and they have taken their seats, and there is no action whatever, express or implied, on the part of the State that they accede to the condition thus imposed. I state this to my friend in order that he may be able to dissipate, as he undoubtedly will, any doubt I may have on the subject owing to the peculiar circumstances of the State itself as now represented here, or attempted to be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question submitted by my friend from Maine, reduced to a simple point, is: at what period of time have we a right to assume that these people become a State under this fundamental condition which we impose upon them, and what is the evidence that they have so become a State? And he inquires whether the entry and representation by Senators in this body will be evidence which will bind the people to the performance of this condition, and to the complete creation and erection of that State. As I have said before in the course of this debate, the people of any State, whatever may be the limitations in their government, whether as to slavery or anything else, may choose to become dissolved and not to exercise the political functions with which they are endowed, whether they are old or new; and when they cease to exercise those functions, to hold elections, to send Senators and Representatives, and to exercise the other acts which are necessary in political communities, of course as an organized political community that State becomes dissolved, and there is no power in the Government at all, because in the nature of things there cannot be, to compel those people to exercise those functions.

Now, if we admit this State with this fundamental condition, which becomes a part of the act of admission; then any action which her agents and representatives may take under it is prima facie evidence that they are exercising political power under the charter of incorporation which we have chosen to grant them. If it turns out afterward that the agents who have thus assumed to represent the State and to exercise those functions with which we have invested them are repudiated by their people, their stockholders, to use an apt illustration, and the stockholders choose to dissolve the corporation, then of course the representative functions of those agents must cease, and we shall only be in the condition that we often are for a short time of having had representatives in this body who, it finally turned out, had no right to be here. We have frequently expelled men, we have frequently rejected the claims of men who have sat as members of this body for a long time upon the ground that they had no lawful authority to sit here at all. Therefore, if these Senators should come in and thus prima facie give vital action to the functions of this State under this law, and their action should be repudiated, (and it would be no new thing if it should be,) and the State should choose to dissolve itself rather than to work under the charter of liberty which we give it, the not new thing will happen that for a short time persons will have sat in this body who it turned out had no right to seats.

That is all the difficulty there is about it, and it is the same difficulty that might have existed, allow me to tell my friend from Maine, under almost every one of these previous acts in some form or other, because the final acts of admission of many of these States have authorized the Senators and Representatives to come in immediately, although there were conditions imposed upon their admission which were not to be submitted to the people of the State. Take, if you please, the State of Michigan, a State which is much better represented in this body, according to my judgment, than it used to be. Its Senators and Representatives had been elected irregularly by the people without the sanction of law at all, without the form or color or pretext of law for it, in opposition to law; and the State came here with its constitution, with its Senators and members elected. We passed an act on the 15th of June, 1836, admitting that State into the Union with certain changed boundaries. We sent it back to the people of that State upon the sole question of boundaries alone, that they should assent to those boundaries and nothing else. Then we proceeded, after having sent it back upon that one point, to enact further:

"That nothing in this act contained, or in the admission of the said State into the Union as one of the United States of America upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be so construed or understood as to confer upon the people, Legislature, or other authorities of the said State of Michigan, any authority or right to interfere with the sale by the United States, and under their authority, of the vacant and unsold lands within the limits of the said State, but that the subject of the public lands, and the interests which may be given to the said State therein, shall be regulated by future action between Congress, on the part of the United States, and the said State, or the authorities thereof. And the said State of Michigan shall in no case, and under no pretense whatsoever, impose any tax, assessment, or imposition of any description upon any of the lands of the United States within its limits."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Was that at war with any express provision of their constitution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; it was not at war with any express provision of their constitution, except that general declaration (not an express provision) of the right of the people of the State to exercise complete political sovereignty over all the subjects within its territory. And I need not say to my honorable friend from Maine that the erection of a sovereignty and giving political power to the people of a certain district conclusively implies that all the political domain in that territory becomes the public domain of the new sovereignty, unless there be in the act creating it, or in the compact by which the act of union is formed, if it be one, some provision to the contrary, because the prima facie and fundamental principle of political communities is, that dominion over all public lands within the borders of that community resides in the sovereign power that controls it; and therefore it is that the very subject of the public lands is an instance and a case in point of the exercise of the highest possible power on the part of the Government of the United States in declaring that, notwithstanding this general principle of politics, the State of Michigan should exercise no such control. Her Senators came in; she has not exercised the control; and now, as the Senator from Michigan would put it, suppose she should turn around and undertake to tax the lands of the United States, to exercise disposal over them on the ground that upon the general principles of politics, being a sovereign and independent State and never having assented to this condition imposed upon her by the Government of the United States, her political power was complete; I do not think her Legislature or her people will do it; but if they should, they would discover I fancy, even as the Supreme Court is now constituted, that their road would be a short one to success in a matter of that kind.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before the Senator from Vermont takes his seat, there is one point to which I wish to call his attention. It is this: the Constitution of the United States as it is, and the Constitution as it is proposed to be, should the constitutional amendment be adopted by the States, expressly admits the right of the States under the Constitution to restrict the franchise. You remember the provision of the Constitution as it stands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And the provision of the constitutional amendment which is proposed to be adopted, and which several of the States have already ratified.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That latter provision is in these words:

"But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for the President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

This constitutional amendment recognizes expressly the power of a State to restrict its suffrage and to deny it to a portion of its male citizens for various reasons. Now, the point to which I call the Senator's attention, and the question I wish he would answer, is this: can Congress by any law, or a State by the ratification of any law of Congress, in any way whatever affect or change that constitutional power which is here admitted to exist in the States? Would not a provision adopted by a State Legislature or the Congress of the United States, or both together, be absolutely void in view of this provision of the Constitution of the United States? Could they alter that? Could they limit the State so that it would not have this power which the Constitution gives? It seems to me it is impossible.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will answer that question by asking my friend one: whether he thinks that constitutional amendment has been legally adopted yet?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not think it has.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then if it has not been adopted we will reserve the discussion of that question until it arises.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The gentleman does not answer the whole question. Under the Constitution as it is the right of each State to define the qualification of its voters is expressly recognized; and as I stated in the beginning, not only the Constitution as it recognizes that right, but the Constitution as it is proposed to be in case the amendment shall be adopted. So I propose to cover both grounds, and it is equally strong whichever you take, the Constitution as it is or the Constitution as you propose to make it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be glad to have my friend from Wisconsin point out to me that clause of the Constitution as it is, as he calls it, which declares that the people of a Territory, who are about being erected into a State shall have the right, against the will of Congress, to prescribe any qualification whatever to any of its citizens.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is not the question I put at all about the people of a Territory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; it is a question I put.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question I put is: whether the people of a State by any act which Congress or the Legislature of the State, or both of them together, can pass can be deprived of a right conferred by the Constitution of the United States. Is not such a provision in conflict with the Constitution of the United States? The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend from Wisconsin got up for the purpose of asking me whether I think Congress can pass a law in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, I shall be obliged to admit, without much reluctance, that I do not think they can.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They can pass one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; it would not be a law, because it could not have the effect of a law. The question, then, is, not whether Congress can pass a valid law in violation of the Constitution of the United States, but, as my friend now puts it, whether in erecting the people of a Territory into that political corporation which we call a State we can provide by law that there shall be equality among men in that State. I undertake to declare, without the fear of successful contradiction, either here or in the Supreme Court, that there is no clause in the present Constitution which prevents us from passing such a law. The present Constitution, it is true, declares that representation in the various States shall be based upon certain principles, which implies, inasmuch as it is based upon the principle of the qualified electors to the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures, that the people of those States may define what are the qualifications of the electors to the most numerous branch of the Legislature; but it does not prove any inequality in the State if when we create a new one we require equality among its citizens any more than the same argument would apply on the subject of slavery which the present Constitution, but for the late amendment, gave the States the right to dispose of. If we choose to erect a Territory into a State, it does not imply that we may not impress upon it, as a part of the fundamental charter under which it shall act, that equality among men in respect to servitude and in respect to the political right of voting should prevail. There is nothing in the Constitution which can be argued on that point.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the Senator from Vermont to concede that under the Constitution as it is the States have a right to prescribe the qualifications of their electors. Now, the point is, can we, by an act of Congress which shall be accepted and ratified by the Legislature of Nebraska, change that constitutional provision so that Nebraska cannot define the qualification of her electors when she becomes a State?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; because she becomes a State of a particular character, a State to whom there never has been imparted the power to act in violation of the law of her existence which we give to her. That is the reason.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My answer to the Senator would be this: Nebraska is a State under the Constitution or she is not. If she is a State under the Constitution, having the rights of a State which the Constitution gives, she must have the right to define the qualification of her electors after she is admitted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Constitution gives to a State which we create under an express power of the Constitution just such rights as we choose to remit to her and no others. That is the very point upon which we have been arguing; and therefore, when we create a State of this description, it is too late for her to say, or for any advocate of hers to say, "although I have been born into life with this complexion and this character as the method upon which I must act, I will now go back to some other State and say that she has privileges which I have not."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will my friend allow me to say one word further?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is this: I think he falls into a fundamental error when he speaks about Congress creating States at all. States grow; States are born; Congress does nothing but recognize their existence and admit them into the Union under the Constitution. Vermont did not grow out of an enabling act of Congress. She came here, growing out of a revolution against the States of New York and New Hampshire, and set up a government of her own, which was recognized by the Congress of the United States, and she was admitted. So was Tennessee; so was Michigan; and so were many of the other States, not in virtue of enabling acts; they grew. It was the people growing up into society that constituted the States, which were recognized, it is true, by Congress, and admitted when Congress in their good pleasure thought proper to recognize and to admit them. I deny altogether that Congress creates a State. It has not the power to create a State. It has only the power to admit those communities which have grown into States or the Territories of the Union into fellowship under the Constitution, with the rights of other States under the Constitution; but when admitted the Constitution is the supreme law which governs every State. Anything that Congress can enact or the Legislature of the State enact to the contrary is as nothing—has no effect whatever; and when Nebraska comes in under the Constitution of the United States, that Constitution reads just the same in Nebraska that it reads in Vermont or in Virginia; and it says to the Legislature of Nebraska and the people of Nebraska that the State has the right to define the qualifications of its electors, and no law of Congress can change it or interfere with it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very much obliged to my friend from Wisconsin for having interpolated into the middle of my plain observations a sufficient amount of eloquence to give them a color to the people. Now, I want to ask my friend from Wisconsin for a little more eloquence in which he shall tell me, supposing then his idea of a State is true, that we reject this bill altogether, is Nebraska a State still or a Territory?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In a territorial condition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I take it there is no State of Nebraska now, as he admits. He admits that there will be no State of Nebraska until we pass this law. What then makes the State of Nebraska? What gives it its life? It must necessarily be, on his own premises, the law which sets it up; and it is a mere quibble and a play upon words which talks about admitting a State as if it preëxisted. It is the act of admission that creates the political corporation which is a State. There is not anything about the idea of a State except that it is a mere political person created by certain rules for certain purposes. That is all there is of a State. It is not any myth, it is not any huge bugbear the people cannot understand, but it is simply and practically a business corporation, endowed with the faculties which are given to it by the law that creates it. If it is the will of the people of Nebraska that creates it, then they may give it such an existence and such a law and such faculties as they please in spite of us. If it is our will that creates it and brings it into life, we may modify and limit the exercise of its will according to our notions of justice and propriety.

Therefore, Mr. President, I have to say that the fundamental difference between the honorable Senator from Wisconsin and the honorable Senator from Michigan and the honorable Senator from Iowa, who have addressed themselves to this amendment, and myself, is, that while they seem to suppose that the State is a State in spite of us, and that we merely make a bargain and a treaty with her by which we come into an alliance, my own position is, and on my side the simple proposition is, that it is the law of Congress that creates the State.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I gave way for an explanation; but there has been a good deal of eloquence and a good deal of argument and a good deal of good law illustrated since I gave way. However, I had pretty much got through with what I had to say. All I wished to say was, that I am willing to take the bill as it originally stood without any amendment; but I was in hopes that these amendments would tend to harmonize and unite us all if they could be adopted, especially this one of the Senator from Vermont, which I know met the approbation of many very good lawyers in the Senate who believed it could be done, and if it could be done properly it would perhaps reconcile all the difficulties that have been surrounding this matter. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, if it shall be adjudged to be constitutional and right, will be adopted and ingrafted upon this bill; and if that will tend to unite us all, so much the better. If it should be rejected, then of course the bill will stand as when we voted for it before; and I presume the minds of the Senate are not changed upon that subject. I do not wish to say anything more about it, and am prepared to vote.

Mr. HOWARD. I have but a word to say, Mr. President, and shall detain the Senate but a moment. The honorable Senator from Vermont cited the case of Michigan as one in point and as supporting his principle. It is new as a historical fact, at least quite new to me, that the constitution and government of Michigan were originally formed "without a shadow of law." I am at a loss to know where he gets his information. I happened to be residing in the Territory of Michigan at the time when that somewhat noted event took place, one which was followed by the Toledo war, which my friend from Ohio may have some recollection of. The fact was this: the Territory of Michigan was fairly and equitably entitled, both on account of her population and her conventional rights, to admission into the Union in 1835. By the ordinance 1787 the right was reserved to her to be admitted whenever her population should reach sixty thousand. She had that population, and a population far exceeding that number; but Congress for some reason did not see fit to admit her, notwithstanding the efforts on her part to obtain admission. In the winter of 1835 her territorial Legislature passed an act calling a convention for the purpose of framing a new constitution and State government for the future State of Michigan. The members of the convention were regularly elected at an election held according to the laws of the Territory, under all the usual sanctions. The members of that body were thus chosen: they held a convention and framed a constitution for the State of Michigan in due form. Under that constitution a temporary State government was organized, and the Legislature of the so-called State of Michigan elected members of this body, and the people elected a member of the House of Representatives. She was not admitted as a member of the Union, however, on account of a very serious controversy which existed between her and the State of Ohio in reference to the southern boundary of the Territory. Congress, at the following session, in 1836, enacted a law for the purpose, among other things, of settling the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and of course the southern boundary of the Territory of Michigan. That part of the statute the Senator did not see fit to read to the Senate. The first section of it defines with exactness the southern boundary of Michigan and the northern boundary of the State of Ohio. Congress then went on in the same statute to provide that the people of Michigan, at a regular convention to be called by them, should give their assent to this change of boundaries, and ultimately that assent was given, and in the year 1837 the State was formally admitted into the Union by act of Congress. So that, instead of being without any shadow of law, the honorable gentleman will find that from the beginning to the end of these proceedings they were all in perfect accordance with law.

It is very true, sir, that in the preliminary act of admission, that is, the act of 1836, the State of Michigan, like other new States, was prohibited from passing any law interfering with the primary disposal of the soil of the United States lying within her limits. That is one of the conditions imposed upon every new State, and for the purpose of getting rid forever of the once mooted question of the power of the State thus to interfere.

My friend from Massachusetts has for the fortieth time placed his opposition to this bill on the ground that it is not according to the "principles of the Declaration of Independence," without undertaking to define very clearly what those principles are, so far as they are applicable to the right of suffrage; but if I understand him correctly, he means to say that the principles of the Declaration of Independence, which declare that all men are created equal, require that every created human being shall have the right of suffrage. I endeavor to put his proposition in its broadest as well as its most exact form, so far as I can understand it. I do not propose to argue it again, having already said quite enough about it, but I cannot resist the temptation to call the attention of that eminent Senator to the fact that the State of Massachusetts is composed of human beings who have been created; all of whom are endowed by their Creator, according to the Declaration of Independence as understood by him, with the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and also the further right of voting. Now, sir, it is confessedly the law of Massachusetts that none but persons who are able to read and write shall be allowed the exercise of the suffrage. I ask him, and I ask his friends upon this floor who are moving along in the same groove with him, how it is that they can reconcile with the principles of the Declaration of Independence a law which excludes a considerable portion of the created human beings of the State of Massachusetts from the right of voting? If the fact of creation and of birth, of being the common children of a common Creator, gives the right of suffrage as one of the inalienable rights of man, then I shall be very much inclined to recommend to that honorable Senator to correct the legislation of his own State in this respect before he attempts to enforce these theories of his upon the people of Nebraska or Colorado or any other Territory about to come into the Union.

Look at it. An aged man in Massachusetts, paralytic, blind, perhaps unable to walk, but in every other respect fit to exercise the right of suffrage, comes, or is brought, to the poll, and is asked by the inspector whether he can read and write, and the old man says he cannot do either. Disease has disabled him; age has rendered him blind; he has not the ability to comply with the requisitions of the Massachusetts statute; he is turned away from the polls and informed that in that ancient and most respectable land of liberty, he, on account of his misfortune, is not permitted to participate in the exercise of the political powers of the Commonwealth.

Or take the case of a man who is not educated at all; who can neither read nor write, but is guilty of no crime and is no pauper; a useful citizen of the community. He, too, applies for the exercise of the same privilege, and he receives the same answer. Can the Senator from Massachusetts, with his mind full of his theories of universal liberty and universal perfectability, say that the legislation of his own State is in accordance with the principles of the Declaration of Independence, if his view of those principles be correct? Certainly not. I would say then to him, but of course in the best spirit and without any design to reproach him or those who follow him: "Physician, heal thyself." I regard it as quite as flagrant a departure from the principles of the Declaration of Independence, if they have any application here, to exclude ignorant white men from voting as to exclude black men from voting.

Sir, there is no use in continuing this discussion of the abstract principle. We find ourselves at every step "in wandering mazes lost," and there will be no end to the discussion. I have but to say that I shall vote against this amendment of my friend from Vermont, believing it to be, unwarranted by the Constitution and of dangerous example for the future, a precedent which may lead to great evils in the future of the new States. I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Missouri for the same reason. I do not think we have the power; but still if it should be the will of a majority of the Senate to adopt either of these amendments, I shall not, under existing circumstances, seeing as plainly, I think, as the Senator from Ohio does, the necessity which hangs over us, feel at liberty to vote against the bill upon its final passage.

Mr. CRESWELL next addressed the Senate. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY read the amendment proposed by Mr. EDMUNDS.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest to the mover of the amendment that perhaps he had better make the exception narrower than it is by striking out the words "or any other right," for if it passes in its present shape the Indians may have every right taken from them. The State is to be prohibited from interfering with the question of suffrage, or interfering with any other right, except in the case of Indians. I am sure the honorable member did not mean to place them under the absolute control of the State, so as to enable the State to do with them with reference to any rights which the Constitution secures, just what she thinks proper.

After having made that suggestion I will proceed now very briefly to state why I am unable to vote for the amendment, if the Senate are desirous of taking the vote on the bill this evening. If it is the pleasure of the Senate that the debate should go over until to-morrow, it would be equally agreeable to me, but I do not ask it on any account personal to myself. I do not therefore ask for an adjournment; but if any other Senator thinks proper to move an adjournment I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. CONNESS. I think it must appear clear to the Senator having this bill in charge that we cannot come to a vote to-day; and I move, therefore, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WADE. I cannot argue that question—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. WADE. But it seems to me we shall never get through unless we hold on. We have been now, I believe, four times endeavoring to reach a vote on this subject.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn, a division was called for.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator from California will withdraw the motion I will see if we cannot come to an agreement as to the time when we shall take the vote. It seems to me that unless we do that there is no hope of ever reaching a conclusion.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to that; and I suggest that we take the vote to-morrow at four o'clock. ["Agreed."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate adjourn. It is not debatable.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose I have a right to withdraw that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to say to the Senator from Ohio that this motion was a friendly motion to the measure he has in charge.

Mr. WADE. I understand that.

Mr. CONNESS. I withdraw the motion now.

Mr. WADE. I am very anxious to have a time fixed, if it can be done by consent of the Senate, when at some hour to-morrow we may agree to take the vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member will propose four o'clock to-morrow I think it will be acceded to.

Mr. WADE. If it is understood that we are to take the vote to-morrow at four o'clock I shall not resist an adjournment.

Mr. SUMNER. Say that debate shall close at three o'clock.

Several SENATORS. Three o'clock.

Mr. WADE. Is three o'clock satisfactory? ["Yes."] Very well.

Mr. CONNESS. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 8, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. PATON, of New Haven, Connecticut. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, was received, announcing that the President of the United States, having returned to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," with his objections thereto, the Senate proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the same, and resolved that the said bill do pass, two thirds of the Senate agreeing to pass the same.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the joint resolution of the Senate No. 154, to provide for the exhibition of the cereal productions of the United States at the Paris Exposition in April next.

CORRECTION.

Mr. SHANKLIN. I rise to correct the Journal of yesterday. Upon the passage of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] I am recorded as not having voted. I was in my seat, and voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected accordingly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a privileged question. To-day is the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans. The day has been usually observed as a holiday. Congress has always, I believe, observed it as such. I therefore move that the House adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no. The question was put, and the Chair decided that the yeas had it.

Mr. FINCK. I demand the yeas and nays. Upon the demand for the yeas and nays there were—yeas 19, nocs 90; not one fifth of a quorum.

Mr. FINCK. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. FINCK and DEFREES.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 22, nocs 88.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the negative, so one fifth not having voted in the affirmative the yeas and nays are not ordered. [Laughter.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been insisted on, the House will resume the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, on which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KASSON. If there is no objection I will yield to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. J. L. THOMAS.]

PATAPSCO RIVER.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS offered the following resolution; which, being a call for executive information, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to transmit to the House all information in the possession of the War Department as to the cost of completing the ship channel of the Patapsco river near the harbor of Baltimore city, and particularly whether the proper estimates and surveys authorized and directed by an act of the last session of Congress have been completed.

LIGHTING OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution for which I have the consent of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I called for the regular order of business supposing that it would be the call of the committees for reports. I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will move to postpone his joint resolution and allow the committees to be called in order that we may be able to get at the presidential veto.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House the veto message without interrupting the regular order.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire into the best and most economical mode of lighting the public buildings and grounds, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. NEWELL. I desire to state that, apprehending I should be absent yesterday, I paired with my colleague [Mr. ROGERS] on the vote on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY.]

Mr. ROGERS. I should have voted in the negative of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. KOONTZ. I will state that I was detained from the House yesterday by sickness. If I had been present I should have voted for the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] in reference to the impeachment of the President.

MASSACRE AT FORT PHIL. KEARNEY.

Mr. RANDALL, of Kentucky, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs inquire into and report to the House the circumstances attending the reported massacre of three officers and ninety-one enlisted men at Fort Phil. Kearney on the 20th of December last, and that they inquire and report whether in their opinion the continued commission of outrages by the Indians is in consequence of or has excuse or palliation in any mismanagement or improper conduct by Government officials or citizens; and that they also inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an immediate or early transfer of the superintendency of our Indian affairs to the War Department, and report by bill or otherwise.

PROTECTION OF SHIPPING INTERESTS.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country were during the war of the rebellion protected and stimulated and improved, while our great commercial interests were nearly ruined for lack of that protection which the Government was unable to afford; and whereas the restoration of our commerce is of great national importance and essential to the maintenance of our position as a first-class Power; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a drawback on all duties and taxes upon all articles used in the construction of steam and sailing vessels.

PORT OF CRESCENT CITY.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a breakwater at the port of Crescent City, California, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BIDWELL. I have a memorial on this subject, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Whereas differences of opinion are manifested upon the subject of universal suffrage; and whereas it has been legalized only in the District of Columbia, and must be tested there if anywhere; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an immediate election of all officers in said District.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object.

ENROLLED BILL AND RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled an act (S. No. 459) suspending the payment of moneys from the Treasury as compensation to persons claiming the service or labor of colored volunteers or drafted men, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 154) to provide for the exhibition of the cereal productions of the United States at the Paris Exposition in April next; when the Speaker signed the same.

JOHN B. COTHRAN.

Mr. STOKES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill for the relief of John B. Cothran, for the purpose of putting it upon its passage.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

MURDER OF UNION SOLDIERS.

Mr. ARNELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee appointed by this House to investigate into the facts and circumstances of the murder of Union soldiers in South Carolina, be instructed further to investigate into all the facts and circumstances connected with the murder of a United States soldier named Crego, at Nashville, Tennessee, in December last; also to investigate into all the facts and circumstances connected with the murder of Frank Erickson, a Union soldier at Somerville, Tennessee, in December last, and to report to this House.

WILLIAM M. ELLIS AND BROTHER.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to examine and settle the claim of William M. Ellis & Brother; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

JOHN B. COTHRAN.

Mr. STOKES. I ask that the bill for the relief of John B. Cothran, of Tennessee, to which objection was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to that.

The bill was accordingly received, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SUFFRAGE IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I must now insist upon the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Constitution of the United States requires the Senate and House of Representatives to proceed at once to the reconsideration of a bill returned with the objections of the President thereto. The Chair asks leave to lay before the House a message from the Senate.

No objection was made.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 7, 1867.

The President of the United States having returned to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," with his objections thereto, the Senate proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the same; and

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, two thirds of the Senate agreeing to pass the same.

J. W. FORNEY,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask that the message of the President, accompanying the message from the Senate, be now read.

The message was read, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have received and considered a bill entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," passed by the Senate on the 18th of December, and by the House of Representatives on the succeeding day. It was presented for my approval on the 26th ultimo—six days after the adjournment of Congress—and is now returned with my objections to the Senate, in which House it originated.

Measures having been introduced, at the commencement of the first session of the present Congress, for the extension of the elective franchise to persons of color in the District of Columbia; steps were taken by the corporate authorities of Washington and Georgetown to ascertain and make known the opinion of the people of the two cities upon a subject so immediately affecting their welfare as a community. The question was submitted to the people at special elections, held in the month of December, 1865, when the qualified voters of Washington and Georgetown, with great unanimity of sentiment, expressed themselves opposed to the contemplated legislation. In Washington, in a vote of 6,556—the largest, with but two exceptions, ever polled in that city—only 32 ballots were cast for negro suffrage; while in Georgetown, in an aggregate of 813 votes—a number considerably in excess of the average vote at the four preceding annual elections—but 1 was given in favor of the proposed extension of the elective franchise. As these elections seem to have been conducted with entire fairness, the result must be accepted as a truthful expression of the opinion of the people of the District upon the question which evoked it. Possessing, as an organized community, the same popular right as the inhabitants of a State or Territory to make known their will upon matters which affect their social and political condition, they could have selected no more appropriate mode of memorializing Congress upon the subject of this bill than through the suffrages of their qualified voters.

Entirely disregarding the wishes of the people of the District of Columbia, Congress has deemed it right and expedient to pass the measure now submitted for my signature. It therefore becomes the duty of the Executive, standing between the legislation of the one and the will of the other, fairly expressed, to determine whether he should approve the bill, and thus aid in placing upon the statute-books of the nation a law against which the people to whom it is to apply have solemnly and with such unanimity protested, or whether he should return it with his objections, in the hope that, upon reconsideration, Congress, acting as the representatives of the inhabitants of the seat of Government, will permit them to regulate a purely local question as to them may seem best suited to their interests and condition.

The District of Columbia was ceded to the United States by Maryland and Virginia, in order that it might become the permanent seat of Government of the United States. Accepted by Congress, it at once became subject to the "exclusive legislation" for which provision is made in the Federal Constitution. It should be borne in mind, however, that in exercising its functions as the law-making power of the District of Columbia, the authority of the national Legislature is not without limit, but that Congress is bound to observe the letter and spirit of the Constitution, as well in the enactment of local laws for the seat of Government as in legislation common to the entire Union. Were it to be admitted that the right "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" conferred upon Congress unlimited power within the District of Columbia, bills of attainder and ex post facto laws might be passed and titles of nobility granted within its boundaries. Laws might be made "respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures," might with impunity be violated. The right of trial by jury might be denied, excessive bail required, excessive fines imposed, and cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. Despotism would thus reign at the seat of Government of a free Republic, and, as a place of permanent residence, it would be avoided by all who prefer the blessing of liberty to the mere emoluments of official position.

It should also be remembered that in legislating for the District of Columbia, under the Federal Constitution, the relation of Congress to its inhabitants is analogous to that of a Legislature to the people of a State, under their own local constitution. It does not, therefore, seem to be asking too much that, in matters pertaining to the District, Congress should have a like respect for the will and interests of its inhabitants as is entertained by a State Legislature for the wishes and prosperity of those for whom they legislate. The spirit of our Constitution and the genius of our Government require that, in regard to any law which is to affect and have a permanent bearing upon a people, their will should exert at least a reasonable influence upon those who are acting in the capacity of their legislators. Would, for instance, the Legislature of the State of New York or of Pennsylvania or of Indiana or of any State in the Union, in opposition to the expressed will of a large majority of the people whom they were chosen to represent, arbitrarily force upon them, as voters, all persons of the African or negro race, and make them eligible for office, without any other qualification than a certain term of residence within the State? In neither of the States named would the colored population, when acting together, be able to produce any great social or political result. Yet, in New York, before he can vote, the man of color must fulfill conditions that are not required of the white citizen; in Pennsylvania the elective franchise is restricted to white freemen; while in Indiana negroes and mulattoes are expressly excluded from the right of suffrage. It hardly seems consistent with the principles of right and justice that representatives of States where suffrage is either denied the colored man, or granted to him on qualifications requiring intelligence or property, should compel the people of the District of Columbia to try an experiment which their own constituents have thus far shown an unwillingness to test for themselves. Nor does it accord with our republican ideas that the principle of self-government should lose its force when applied to the residents of the District merely because their legislators are not, like those of the States, responsible, through the ballot, to the people for whom they are the law-making power.

The great object of placing the seat of Government under the exclusive legislation of Congress was to secure the entire independence of the General Government from undue State influence, and to enable it to discharge, without danger of interruption or infringement of its authority, the high functions for which it was created by the people. For this important purpose it was ceded to the United States by Maryland and Virginia, and it certainly never could have been contemplated, as one of the objects to be attained by placing it under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress; that it would afford to propagandists or political parties a place for an experimental test of their principles and theories. While, indeed, the residents of the seat of Government are not citizens of any State, and are not therefore allowed a voice in the Electoral College or representation in the councils of the nation, they are nevertheless American citizens, entitled as such to every guarantee of the Constitution, to every benefit of the laws; and to every right which pertains to citizens of our common country. In all matters, then, affecting their domestic affairs, the spirit of our democratic form of Government demands that their wishes should be consulted and respected, and they taught to feel that, although not permitted practically to participate in national concerns, they are nevertheless under a paternal Government, regardful of their rights, mindful of their wants, and solicitous for their prosperity. It was evidently contemplated that all local questions would be left to their decision, at least to an extent that would not be incompatible with the object for which Congress was granted exclusive legislation over the seat of Government. When the Constitution was yet under consideration it was assumed by Mr. Madison that its inhabitants would be allowed "a municipal Legislature, for local purposes, derived from their own suffrages." When for the first time Congress, in the year 1800, assembled at Washington, President Adams, in his speech at its opening, reminded the two Houses that it was for them to consider whether the local powers over the District of Columbia, vested by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States, should be immediately exercised, and he asked them to "consider it as the capital of a great nation, advancing with unexampled rapidity in arts, in commerce, in wealth, and in population, and possessing within itself those resources which, if not thrown away or lamentably misdirected, would secure to it a long course of prosperity and self-government." Three years had not elapsed when Congress was called upon to determine the propriety of retroceding to Maryland and Virginia the jurisdiction of the territory which they had, respectively, relinquished to the Government of the United States.

It was urged, on the one hand, that exclusive jurisdiction was not necessary or useful to the Government; that it deprived the inhabitants of the District of their political rights; that much of the time of Congress was consumed in legislation pertaining to it; that its government was expensive; that Congress was not competent to legislate for the District, because the members were strangers to its local concerns; and that it was an example of a government without representation—an experiment dangerous to the liberties of the States. On the other hand, it was held, among other reasons, and successfully, that the Constitution, the acts of cession of Virginia and Maryland, and the act of Congress accepting the grant, all contemplated the exercise of exclusive legislation by Congress, and that its usefulness, if not its necessity, was inferred from the inconvenience which was felt for want of it by the Congress of the Confederation; that the people themselves, who it was said had been deprived of their political rights, had not complained and did not desire a retrocession; that the evil might be remedied by giving them a representation in Congress when the District should become sufficiently populous, and in the meantime a local Legislature; that if the inhabitants had not political rights they had great political influence; that the trouble and expense of legislating for the District would not be great, but would diminish, and might in a great measure be avoided by a local Legislature; and that Congress could not retrocede the inhabitants without their consent. Continuing to live substantially under the laws that existed at the time of the cession, and such changes only having been made as were suggested by themselves, the people of the District have not sought, by a local Legislature, that which has generally been willingly conceded by the Congress of the nation.

As a general rule, sound policy requires that the Legislature should yield to the wishes of a people, when not inconsistent with the Constitution and the laws. The measures suited to one community might not be well adapted to the condition of another; and the persons best qualified to determine such questions are those whose interests are to be directly affected by any proposed law. In Massachusetts, for instance, male persons are allowed to vote without regard to color, provided they possess a certain degree of intelligence. In a population in that State of 1,231,066, there were, by the census of 1860, only 9,602 persons of color; and of the males over twenty years of age, there were 339,086 white to 2,602 colored. By the same official enumeration there were in the District of Columbia 60,764 whites to 14,316 persons of the colored race. Since then, however, the population of the District has largely increased, and it is estimated that at the present time there are nearly 100,000 whites to 30,000 negroes. The cause of the augmented numbers of the latter class needs no explanation. Contiguous to Maryland and Virginia, the District, during the war, became a place of refuge for those who escaped from servitude, and it is yet the abiding place of a considerable proportion of those who sought within its limits a shelter from bondage. Until then held in slavery, and denied all opportunities for mental culture, their first knowledge of the Government was acquired when, by conferring upon them freedom, it became the benefactor of their race; the test of their capability for improvement began when for the first time the career of free industry and the avenues to intelligence were opened to them. Possessing these advantages but a limited time—the greater number perhaps having entered the District of Columbia during the later years of the war or since its termination—we may well pause to inquire whether, after so brief a probation, they are as a class capable of an intelligent exercise of the right of suffrage, and qualified to discharge the duties of official position. The people who are daily witnesses of their mode of living, and who have become familiar with their habits of thought, have expressed the conviction that they are not yet competent to serve as electors, and thus become eligible for office in the local governments under which they live. Clothed with the elective franchise, their numbers, already largely in excess of the demand for labor, would be soon increased by an influx from the adjoining States. Drawn from fields where employment is abundant, they would in vain seek it here, and so add to the embarrassments already experienced from the large class of idle persons congregated in the District. Hardly yet capable of forming correct judgments upon the important questions that often make the issues of a political contest, they could readily be made subservient to the purposes of designing persons.

While in Massachusetts, under the census of 1860, the proportion of white to colored males over twenty years of age was one hundred and thirty to one, here the black race constitutes nearly one third of the entire population, while the same class surrounds the District on all sides, ready to change their residence at a moment's notice, and with all the facility of a nomadic people, in order to enjoy here, after a short residence, a privilege they find nowhere else. It is within their power, in one year, to come into the District in such numbers as to have the supreme control of the white race, and to govern them by their own officers, and by the exercise of all the municipal authority—among the rest, of the power of taxation over property in which they have no interest. In Massachusetts, where they have enjoyed the benefits of a thorough educational system, a qualification of intelligence is required, while here suffrage is extended to all, without discrimination, as well to the most incapable, who can prove a residence in the District of one year, as to those persons of color who, comparatively few in number, are permanent inhabitants, and, having given evidence of merit and qualification, are recognized as useful and responsible members of the community. Imposed upon an unwilling people, placed, by the Constitution, under the exclusive legislation of Congress, it would be viewed as an arbitrary exercise of power, and as an indication by the country of the purpose of Congress to compel the acceptance of negro suffrage by the States. It would engender a feeling of opposition and hatred between the two races, which, becoming deep-rooted and ineradicable, would prevent them from living together in a state of mutual friendliness. Carefully avoiding every measure that might tend to produce such a result, and following the clear and well-ascertained popular will, we should assiduously endeavor to promote kindly relations between them, and thus, when that popular will leads the way, prepare for the gradual and harmonious introduction of this new element into the political power of the country.

It cannot be urged that the proposed extension of suffrage in the District of Columbia is necessary to enable persons of color to protect either their interests or their rights. They stand here precisely as they stand in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. Here, as elsewhere, in all that pertains to civil rights, there is nothing to distinguish this class of persons from citizens of the United States; for they possess the "full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens," and are made "subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." Nor, as has been assumed, are their suffrages necessary to aid a loyal sentiment here; for local governments already exist of undoubted fealty to the Government, and are sustained by communities which were among the first to testify their devotion to the Union, and which during the struggle furnished their full quotas of men to the military service of the country.

The exercise of the elective franchise is the highest attribute of an American citizen, and, when guided by virtue, intelligence, patriotism, and a proper appreciation of our institutions, constitutes the true basis of a democratic form of government, in which the sovereign power is lodged in the body of the people. Its influence for good necessarily depends upon the elevated character and patriotism of the elector, for if exercised by persons who do not justly estimate its value and who are indifferent as to its results, it will only serve as a means of placing power in the hands of the unprincipled and ambitious, and must eventuate in the complete destruction of that liberty of which it should be the most powerful conservator. Great danger is therefore to be apprehended from an untimely extension of the elective franchise to any new class in our country, especially when the large majority of that class, in wielding the power thus placed in their hands, cannot be expected correctly to comprehend the duties and responsibilities which pertain to suffrage. Yesterday, as it were, four million persons were held in a condition of slavery that had existed for generations; to-day they are free-men, and are assumed by law to be citizens. It cannot be presumed, from their previous condition of servitude, that, as a class, they are as well informed as to the nature of our Government as the intelligent foreigner who makes our land the home of his choice. In the case of the latter, neither a residence of five years and the knowledge of our institutions which it gives, nor attachment to the principles of the Constitution, are the only conditions upon which he can be admitted to citizenship. He must prove, in addition, a good moral character, and thus give reasonable ground for the belief that he will be faithful to the obligations which he assumes as a citizen of the Republic. Where a people—the source of all political power—speak by their suffrages, through the instrumentality of the ballot-box, it must be carefully guarded against the control of those who are corrupt in principle and enemies of free institutions, for it can only become to our political and social system a safe conductor of healthy popular sentiment when kept free from demoralizing influences. Controlled through fraud and usurpation by the designing, anarchy and despotism must inevitably follow. In the hands of the patriotic and worthy our Government will be preserved upon the principles of the Constitution inherited from our fathers. It follows, therefore, that in admitting to the ballot-box a new class of voters not qualified for the exercise of the elective franchise, we weaken our system of government instead of adding to its strength and durability.

In returning this bill to the Senate, I deeply regret that there should be any conflict of opinion between the legislative and executive departments of the Government in regard to measures that vitally affect the prosperity and peace of the country. Sincerely desiring to reconcile the States with one another, and the whole people to the Government of the United States, it has been my earnest wish to co-operate with Congress in all measures having for their object a proper and complete adjustment of the questions resulting from our late civil war. Harmony between the coordinate branches of the Government, always necessary for the public welfare, was never more demanded than at the present time, and it will therefore be my constant aim to promote, as far as possible, concert of action between them. The differences of opinion that have already occurred have rendered me only the more cautious, lest the Executive should encroach upon any of the prerogatives of Congress, or, by exceeding in any manner the constitutional limit of his duties, destroy the equilibrium which should exist between the several coordinate departments, and which is so essential to the harmonious working of the Government. I know it has been urged that the executive department is more likely to enlarge the sphere of its action than either of the other two branches of the Government, and especially in the exercise of the veto power conferred upon it by the Constitution. It should be remembered, however, that this power is wholly negative and conservative in its character, and was intended to operate as a check upon unconstitutional, hasty, and improvident legislation, and as a means of protection against invasions of the just powers of the executive and judicial departments. It is remarked by Chancellor Kent that—

"To enact laws is a transcendent power; and, if the body that possesses it be a full and equal representation of the people, there is danger of its pressing with destructive weight upon all the other parts of the machinery of Government. It has therefore been thought necessary by the most skillful and most experienced artists in the science of civil polity that strong barriers should be erected for the protection and security of the other necessary powers of the Government. Nothing has been deemed more fit and expedient for the purpose than the provision that the head of the executive department should be so constituted as to secure a requisite share of independence, and that he should have a negative upon the passing of laws; and that the judiciary power, resting on a still more permanent basis, should have the right of determining upon the validity of laws by the standard of the Constitution."

The necessity of some such check in the hands of the Executive is shown by reference to the most eminent writers upon our system of government, who seem to concur in the opinion that encroachments are most to be apprehended from the department in which all legislative powers are vested by the Constitution. Mr. Madison, in referring to the difficulty of providing some practical security for each against the invasion of the others, remarks that—tending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex." "The founders of our republics" * * * "seem never to have recollected the danger from legislative usurpations, which, by assembling all power in the same hands, must lead to the same tyranny as is threatened by Executive usurpations." "In a representative republic, where the executive magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and the duration of its power, and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly which is inspired by a supposed influence over the people, with an intrepid confidence in its own strength, which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude, yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions by means which reason prescribes; it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions." "The legislative department derives a superiority in our governments from other circumstances. Its constitutional powers being at once more extensive and less susceptible of precise limits, it can with the greater facility mask, under complicated and indirect measures, the encroachments which it makes on the coordinate departments." "On the other side, the executive power being restrained within a narrower compass, and being more simple in its nature, and the judiciary being described by landmarks still less uncertain, projects of usurpation by either of these departments would immediately betray and defeat themselves. Nor is this all. As the legislative department alone has access to the pockets of the people, and has in some constitutions full discretion, and in all a prevailing influence over the pecuniary rewards of those who fill the other departments, a dependence is thus created in the latter which gives still greater facility to encroachments of the former." We have seen that the tendency of republican governments is to an aggrandizement of the legislative, at the expense of the other departments."

Mr. Jefferson, in referring to the early constitution of Virginia, objected that by its provisions all the powers of government—legislative, executive, and judicial—resulted to the legislative body, holding that—

"The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one." * * * "As little will it avail us that they are chosen by ourselves. An elective despotism was not the Government we sought for, but one which should not only be founded on free principles, but in which the powers of government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of magistracy as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others. For this reason that convention which passed the ordinance of government laid its foundation on this basis: that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments should be separate and distinct, so that no person should exercise the powers of more than one of them at the same time. But no barrier was provided between these several powers. The judiciary and executive members were left dependent on the legislature for their subsistence in office, and some of them for their continuance in it. If, therefore, the Legislature assumes executive and judiciary powers, no opposition is likely to be made, nor, if made, can be effectual; because in that case they may put their proceedings into the form of an act of assembly, which will render them obligatory on the other branches. They have accordingly, in many instances, decided rights which should have been left to judiciary controversy; and the direction of the Executive during the whole time of their session is becoming habitual and familiar."

Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, reviews the same subject, and says:

"The truth is, that the legislative power is the great and overruling power in every free Government." "The representatives of the people will watch with jealousy every encroachment of the Executive Magistrate, for it trenches upon their own authority. But who shall watch the encroachment of these representatives themselves? Will they be as jealous of the exercise of power by themselves as by others?" "There are many reasons which may be assigned for the engrossing influence of the legislative department. In the first place, its constitutional powers are more extensive, and less capable of being brought within precise limits than those of either of the other departments. The bounds of the executive authority are easily marked out and defined. It reaches few objects, and those are known. It cannot transcend them without being brought in contact with the other departments. Laws may check and restrain and bound its exercise. The same remarks apply with still greater force to the judiciary. The jurisdiction is, or may be, bounded to a few objects or persons; or, however general and unlimited, its operations are necessarily confined to the mere administration of private and public justice. It cannot punish without law. It cannot create controversies to act upon. It can decide only upon rights and cases as they are brought by others before it. It can do nothing for itself. It must do everything for others. It must obey the laws; and if it corruptly administers them, it is subjected to the power of impeachment. On the other hand, the legislative power, except in the few cases of constitutional prohibition, is unlimited. It is forever varying its means and its ends. It governs the institutions and laws and public policy of the country. It regulates all its vast interests. It disposes of all its property. Look but at the exercise of two or three branches of its ordinary powers. It levies all taxes; it directs and appropriates all supplies; it gives the rules for the descent, distribution, and devises of all property held by individuals. It controls the sources and the resources of wealth. It changes at its will the whole fabric of the laws. It molds at its pleasure almost all the institutions which give strength and comfort and dignity to society. In the next place, it is the direct, visible representative of the will of the people in all the changes of times and circumstances. It has the pride as well as the power of numbers. It is easily moved and steadily moved by the strong impulses of popular feeling and popular odium. It obeys, without reluctance, the wishes and the will of the majority for the time being. The path to public favor lies open by such obedience; and it finds not only support, but impunity, in whatever measures the majority advises, even though they transcend the constitutional limits. It has no motive, therefore, to be jealous or scrupulous in its own use of power; and it finds its ambition stimulated and its arm strengthened by the countenance and the courage of numbers. These views are not alone those of men who look with apprehension upon the fate of republics; but they are also freely admitted by some of the strongest advocates for popular rights and the permanency of republican institutions. "Each department should have a will of its own." "Each should have its own independence secured beyond the power of being taken away by either or both of the others. But at the same time the relations of each to the other should be so strong that there should be a mutual interest to sustain and protect each other. There should not only be constitutional means but personal motives to resist encroachments of one or either of the others. Thus ambition would be made to counteract ambition; the desire of power to check power; and the pressure of interest to balance an opposing interest." "The judiciary is naturally, and almost necessarily, (as has been already said,) the weakest department. It can have no means of influence by patronage. Its powers can never be wielded for itself. It has no command over the purse or the sword of the nation. It can neither lay taxes nor appropriate money nor command armies nor appoint to office. It is never brought into contact with the people by constant appeals and solicitations and private intercourse, which belong to all the other departments of Government. It is seen only in controversies or in trials and punishments. Its rigid justice and impartiality give it no claims to favor, however they may to respect. It stands solitary and unsupported, except by that portion of public opinion which is interested only in the strict administration of justice. It can rarely secure the sympathy or zealous support either of the Executive or the Legislature. If they are not (as is not unfrequently the case) jealous of its prerogatives, the constant necessity of scrutinizing the acts of each, upon the application of any private person, and the painful duty of pronouncing judgment that these acts are a departure from the law or Constitution, can have no tendency to conciliate kindness or nourish influence. It would seem, therefore, that some additional guards would, under such circumstances, be necessary to protect this department from the absolute dominion of the others. Yet rarely have any such guards been applied; and every attempt to introduce them has been resisted with a pertinacity which demonstrates how slow popular leaders are to introduce checks upon their own power, and how slow the people are to believe that the judiciary is the real bulwark of their liberties." "If any department of the Government has undue influence, or absorbing power, it certainly has not been either the executive or judiciary."

In addition to what has been said by these distinguished writers, it may also be urged that the dominant party in each House may, by the expulsion of a sufficient number of members, or by the exclusion from representation of a requisite number of States, reduce the minority to less than one third. Congress, by these means, might be enabled to pass a law, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, which would render impotent the other two departments of the Government, and make inoperative the wholesome and restraining power which it was intended by the framers of the Constitution should be exerted by them. This would be a practical concentration of all power in the Congress of the United States—this, in the language of the author of the Declaration of Independence, would be "precisely the definition of despotic Government."

I have preferred to reproduce these teachings of the great statesmen and constitutional lawyers of the early and later days of the Republic rather than to rely simply upon an expression of my own opinions. We cannot too often recur to them, especially at a conjuncture like the present. Their application to our actual condition is so apparent that they now come to us a living voice, to be listened to with more attention than at any previous period of our history. We have been and are yet in the midst of popular commotion. The passions aroused by a great civil war are still dominant. It is not a time favorable to that calm and deliberate judgment which is the only safe guide when radical changes in our institutions are to be made. The measure now before me is one of those changes. It initiates an untried experiment for a people who have said, with one voice, that it is not for their good. This alone should make us pause; but it is not all. The experiment has not been tried, or so much as demanded by the people of the several States for themselves. In but few of the States has such an innovation been allowed as giving the ballot to the colored population without any other qualification than a residence of one year, and in most of them the denial of the ballot to this race is absolute, and by fundamental law placed beyond the domain of ordinary legislation. In most of those States the evil of such suffrage would be partial; but, small as it would be, it is guarded by constitutional barriers. Here the innovation assumes formidable proportions, which may easily grow to such an extent as to make the white population a subordinate element in the body-politic.

After full deliberation upon this measure, I cannot bring myself to approve it, even upon local considerations, nor yet as the beginning of an experiment on a larger scale. I yield to no one in attachment to that rule of general suffrage which distinguishes our policy as a nation. But there is a limit, wisely observed hitherto, which makes the ballot a privilege and a trust, and which requires of some classes a time suitable for probation and preparation. To give it indiscriminately to a new class, wholly unprepared by previous habits and opportunities, to perform the trust which it demands, is to degrade it, and finally to destroy its power; for it may be safely assumed that no political truth is better established than that such indiscriminate and all-embracing extension of popular suffrage must end at last in its destruction.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 5, 1867.

The question was: Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Upon that question I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Constitution requiring that upon the reconsideration of bills returned by the President with his objections thereto, the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays and entered upon the Journal, the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was accordingly taken by yeas and nays; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 38, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Deffrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koozts, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McRuer, Mercut, Miller, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Spalding, Starr, Stokes, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and the Speaker—113.

NAYS—Messrs. Acona, Bergen, Campbell, Chandler, Cooper, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hise, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Leftwich, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, and Winfield—38.

vens, Stilwell, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Wright—41.

The SPEAKER. On the question whether the House, on reconsideration, agrees to the passage of this law, the yeas are 113, the nays 38. It having been certified that the Senate, upon a reconsideration of the passage of this bill, agrees to its passage by a two-third vote, and the House of Representatives, upon a similar reconsideration, having agreed to its passage by a two-third vote, I therefore, according to the Constitution of the United States, do declare that, notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States, the act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia has become a law. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries promptly checked by the Speaker.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 151) appropriating money to defray the expenses of the joint select committee on retrenchment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the joint resolution in relation to the abolition of slavery, pending at the adjournment of yesterday, and upon which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to make a suggestion?

Mr. KASSON. I think I probably know the motion the gentleman desires to make. If I am not mistaken the gentleman proposes to move an adjournment in honor of the 8th of January. I propose, by the passage of this joint resolution in the interests of the free citizens of the United States, to celebrate the 8th of January better than it was celebrated originally at New Orleans.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman then proposes to honor the colored people, and not the memory of General Jackson.

Mr. SCHENCK. It will be in honor of the negroes who fought under him.

MRS. M. B. HUMPHREY.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will my colleague [Mr. KASSON] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KASSON. I will.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I submit the following resolution, and ask that it may be considered at the present time:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be directed to pay Mrs. M. B. Humphrey, widow of the late Hon. James Humphrey, the amount of increased compensation provided by law from the commencement of the present Congress to the date of the death of her husband.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman allow me to move an amendment to his resolution to insert a provision for paying to Hon. D. W. Gooch increased compensation from the time of his election to the date of his resignation?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, sir; I cannot yield for that purpose. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

The House, agreeably to order, resumed the consideration of the following joint resolution declaratory of the meaning of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America:

Whereas the Congress of the United States at the second session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, proposed to the several States for adoption the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which has now, by the ratification of three fourths of the States of the Union, become part of the Constitution, and which by its terms forever prohibits slavery or involuntary servitude, "except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted," and whereas in some parts of this Union it is asserted and maintained that, notwithstanding said amendment, it is lawful to sell or otherwise commit into unofficial subjection to slavery persons who may be convicted of offenses against the law, by reason whereof certain inferior tribunals have adjudged free citizens of the United States to be so disposed of as to reestablish chattel slavery for life or for years, against the principles of the Christian religion, of civilization, and of the Constitution of the United States, which now recognizes no involuntary servitude, except to the law and to the officers of its administration: Now therefore,

Be it resolved, &c. That the true intent and meaning of said amendment prohibits slavery or involuntary servitude forever in all forms, except in direct execution of a sentence imposing a definite penalty according to law, which penalty cannot, without violation of the Constitution, impose any other servitude than that of imprisonment or other restraint of freedom under the immediate control of officers of the law and according to the usual course thereof, to the exclusion of all unofficial control of the person so held in servitude; and that all orders, judgments, or decrees authorizing or directing the sale or other disposition into servitude of any person within the jurisdiction of the United States otherwise than as above declared to be lawful, are and shall be taken and held to be in violation of the thirteenth constitutional amendment aforesaid, and therefore void.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, the proposition now before the House is, in my judgment, second in importance only to the amendment of the Constitution itself, which was adopted, prohibiting slavery in the United States. I apprehend that few members of this House or of Congress, at the time of the passage of the amendment, supposed that in the very sentence abolishing slavery throughout the United States they had also made provision for its revival under another form and through the action of the courts of the country. The facts certified to us by the newspapers of the South, from week to week, show that the result of that action, as it is there construed, is to revive the institution of chattel slavery with all its odious characteristics; that free men, declared to be free by this clause of the Constitution, are put upon the auction-block to-day and sold to the highest bidder into slavery.

Now, sir, I have felt the conviction—which I have no doubt is shared by every loyal member of this House—that this was not within the intention of that anti-slavery amendment of the Constitution, and that to tolerate it in this land of liberty is to tolerate a usurpation by inferior judicial tribunals directly in the face of the Constitution of the United States. Sir, this clause, as we know, was drawn from the ordinance of 1787.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me for a question?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman, in the first place, whether this is intended as an additional amendment to the Constitution? I ask this question as preliminary to another.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman is well aware that it is not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether in his judgment this Congress has the power to give construction to a constitutional amendment which shall be binding upon the States which have adopted that amendment?

Mr. KASSON. I was proceeding to answer that question at the moment I was interrupted. I will now proceed to answer it, and afterward all other questions which may be put in good faith.

This clause was adopted from the language of the ordinance of 1787. At the time that that ordinance became the law of the land, the institution of slavery did exist de facto in the several States of this Union—in fact, in the majority of the States of this Union. There was, therefore, at that time, according to law, an existing condition of slavery, into which men could be sold if necessary, according to the language of that ordinance. Since that time the Congress of the United States, supported by three fourths of the States of the Union, and indorsed by the people of the country, has abolished the condition of slavery into which a freeman could under any circumstances be sold. The consequence is that the reason for that construction of this language has failed; and, according to an old legal maxim, the law itself fails, so far as it could under other circumstances receive that interpretation.

I affirm, sir, without fear of successful and reasonable contradiction, that, in this condition of things, since the anti-slavery amendment was adopted, you cannot find a condition of chattel slavery existing in the United States into which a freeman can be sold under this language of the Constitution. On the contrary, a freeman can be condemned by the law only to the involuntary servitude now existing within the United States, within the walls of prisons, and within the jurisdiction of the law and the officers of the law. And it is upon this principle, in view of this fact of construction, that I assert that the interpretation given to that clause of the Constitution has been erroneous wherever it has been adopted; that there is no longer found within the United States any such description of slavery as that into which, according to the construction in the southern States, free men may justifiably be condemned.

Well, sir, further than that, further than the general right we have to construe any statute in the creation of which we have taken part as the Congress of the United States, I also affirm, under the second section of that amendment the Congress of the United States has the right to enforce that anti-slavery amendment, and in that right of enforcement we have the right to say what falls within the terms of that amendment as being slavery or involuntary servitude.

This is the clause to which I refer: "Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation;" and aside from the general right to which I have referred, I find the right in the second clause of the amendment to define the species of slavery or involuntary servitude into which a free man may be lawfully condemned by the laws of the country.

Now, I will hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I must beg the gentleman's pardon if he has answered my question. It seems to me he has not answered it. The question I propounded is this: if we have adopted a constitutional provision which has also been adopted by the requisite number of States to put it in force as a part of the fundamental law, whether by the simple act of Congress we can enlarge that provision or change it in any form so as to give an effect to it different from that which its language and spirit must bear?

Mr. KASSON. The question, as now presented, is modified in form from what it was before, as well as in substance, thus showing I have effectually answered the question as to our right to give effect to that clause of the amendment. And I now answer the second form of the question. While I must confess, and, as I cheerfully do, admit that he cannot, by a construction we give to the Constitution, overrule the right of the sovereign judicial tribunal of the country to pass as it thinks right upon a constitutional clause, I do assert that Congress, as the power originally creating the clause, has the right to construe it, and that there is not a loyal tribunal in this country that will dare to treat with disrespect the construction given by this body to this clause of the Constitution, if you admit it to be doubtful in its construction. And I should have added this, sir, if the question had not been put, that it is the duty of this great branch of the Government, which originates legislation, to affirm what they meant by that legislation whenever it shall be called into doubt by existing facts in the country.

This construction will have, as I have shown by the terms of the amendment including the second clause, the legal force necessary, and in addition to that I trust it will have a vast moral force throughout the United States, particularly if the gentlemen on that side of the House will, at this late day and hour of repentance for their opposition to the original amendment, come in and affirm now, in harmony with the great sentiment not only of the United States, but of the whole civilized world, that the construction of every doubtful law in this free country shall be in the interest of freedom and for the protection of individual rights.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to inquire of my friend from Iowa whether he claims there is power in the legislative department of this Government to declare the judgment and decree of a court to be void and to be set aside?

Mr. KASSON. If the decree be valid the action of this body cannot defeat it. We have the right to declare invalid what is so in itself; but the effect of this proposed action of Congress, by virtue of the construction I have attempted to show we had the right to give, will be to declare the consequences of the other construction to be void and of no account in the execution of the law.

Mr. FINCK. It is proposed by this joint resolution to declare that all orders, judgments, or decrees authorizing or directing the sale or other disposition into servitude of any person within the said section of the United States otherwise than as above declared to be lawful, are and shall be taken and held to be in violation of the thirteenth constitutional amendment aforesaid, and therefore void.

Now, I ask whether there is any precedent in the history of the legislation of this Congress to authorize by legislative enactment the setting aside of the judgments and decrees of a court, whether Federal or State? I ask whether the appropriate jurisdiction of this branch of Government is not to make laws and to allow the judiciary to determine what the law is?

Mr. KASSON. I answer, Mr. Speaker, that from the beginning of this Government to this day, whenever a law which justified arrest and imprisonment of a citizen has been repealed and ceased to exist, the party imprisoned must be set free. I further say that by virtue of the legislation proposed, the effect will be that men who are held in servitude under color of this false construction of the law will be inevitably entitled to their freedom.

Mr. FINCK. One more question. I ask my friend whether this question does not belong appropriately, legitimately, and constitutionally to the Supreme Court of the United States and not to Congress?

Mr. KASSON. I am glad my friend has put that question for it presents an additional reason which I intended to present for the prompt action of Congress on the subject. There are questions now pending in inferior tribunals which are soon to be determined probably by the superior tribunals of some of the States of this Union, and by the supreme judicial tribunals of the United States, on appeal from the decision of the lower tribunals in question. But before that is done it is the duty of Congress to exhaust its power, whether originally to construe such amendment, or deliberately, under the second clause, by actual legislation, to declare what shall be the law of the land. If we adopt this joint resolution, and it becomes law prior to the final decision of the question referred to, we vastly strengthen the grounds on which the United States judiciary can decide this to be the right construction, supported as it is by the construing and positive legislative power of the United States.

Why, sir, if this be not done, you not only fail to construe your own act and exhaust your power in the interest of the liberty of the citizen, but you leave the local laws which we believe to be in contravention of that clause of the Constitution in full force and effect over the State tribunals, while we ourselves are silent on the subject to the extent of our power of legislation.

I wish to add, as I have already stated, that the final decision of this question rests in each case properly presented to it with the supreme judicial tribunal of the country.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to ask a further question: whether there is not a complete remedy for the cases to which the gentleman has referred in the courts, State and Federal—complete redress for the grievances of which he complains?

Mr. KASSON. No, sir; I state emphatically, no, in point of fact. Why, sir, within sight of the eyes of the very Goddess of Liberty—if they possessed the power of seeing—that stands on the dome of this Capitol, we find these barbaric enormities transpiring, almost within the hearing of our own ears, in the State of Maryland.

Mr. FINCK. One more question. I ask the gentleman whether this very question of the true construction of the constitutional amendment is not now pending before the judicial tribunals arising out of a case in the State of Maryland?

Mr. KASSON. I understand it to be pending before inferior tribunals, and I understand they have a right to bring it to the highest Federal tribunal.

Mr. FINCK. Certainly, that is all I want.

Mr. KASSON. But prior to that being done, I insist on the argument I have offered, that in the interest of freedom this Congress should exhaust its power, alike of construction and of legislation, in aid of the determination of the rights of these citizens under the laws of the United States to personal freedom from any control except that of the law and its officers.

I now ask the Clerk to read, in justification of the necessity for some legislation, an extract from a paper showing what has been done near us in the State of Maryland:

The Clerk read, as follows:

NEGROES SOLD AS A PUNISHMENT FOR CRIME.

PUBLIC SALE.—The undersigned will offer for sale at the court-house door in the city of Annapolis, at eleven o'clock a. m. on Saturday, the 22d of December, a negro man named John Johnson, aged about forty years. The said negro was convicted at the October term, 1866, of the circuit court of Anne Arundel county, of larceny, and sentenced to be sold.

WILLIAM BRYAN, Sheriff.

BALTIMORE, December 24.—Four negroes convicted of larceny, and ordered to be sold by Judge Magruder at Annapolis, were sold on Saturday last.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THAYER. I wish to inquire whether he intends to give an opportunity for amendment of this resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I have modified it in the last clause, and I will ask the Clerk to read it as modified before the gentleman offers his amendment.

Mr. THAYER. I understand the gentleman intends to afford an opportunity to propose amendments.

Mr. KASSON. I prefer first to hear them lest they may defeat the object of the joint resolution. I ask the Clerk to read my modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the last part of the proposed joint resolution the following:

And that all orders, judgments, or decrees authorizing or directing the sale or other disposition into servitude of any person within the jurisdiction of the United States otherwise than as above declared to be lawful, are and shall be taken and held to be in violation of the thirteenth constitutional amendment aforesaid, and therefore void; and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And that all orders, judgments, or decrees authorizing or directing any disposition into involuntary servitude of any person within the jurisdiction of the United States otherwise than as above declared to be lawful, or authorizing or directing the sale of any person in any case whatever into slavery or involuntary servitude, are and shall be taken and held to be in violation of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution aforesaid, and void.

Mr. KASSON. The point to which I wish to call attention in the proposed amendment is this, that it proclaims distinctly, while it was left slightly in doubt in the former draft before the country, that no such thing as selling a man into slavery can possibly exist in the present condition of the Constitution and laws of the country; that there must be a direct condemnation into that condition under the control of the officers of the law, like the sentence of a man to hard labor in the State prison in the regular and ordinary course of law, and that is the only kind of involuntary servitude known to the Constitution and the law. I will now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] to have his amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That any person or persons who shall hereafter sell, or offer for sale, or attempt to sell any person or persons whomsoever within the limits of the United States, or who shall make or issue any order for such sale, or who shall in anywise participate in such sale or attempted sale, shall be held to be guilty of felony, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be imprisoned for a period of time not exceeding ten years, or fined in a sum not exceeding $10,000, or both, in the discretion of the court by which such offender shall be tried.

Mr. THAYER. I desire, with the permission of the gentleman, at some time when convenient to himself, to say a very few words in support of my amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I will say that if that were added as an additional section to the bill and the title were altered so as to conform to it, I should have no objection to that legislation to enforce what I have declared to be the present state of the law. I want this construction as a matter of justice to the Congress of the United States and the people who adopted the constitutional amendment, to show that they never intended chattel slavery to be reestablished under any circumstances; and I have no objection to taking the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as a second section to enforce the construction which I insist on.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman will allow me a single moment I will say that I think the construction sufficiently appears from his preamble.

I do not like, I must confess, the idea of laws being passed purporting upon their face to construe the Constitution. But I assume and I presume no man doubts that the true interpretation of the constitutional amendment is exactly that which is proposed by the gentleman from Iowa. I propose to assume that it is a gross violation of the Constitution of the United States and of the liberties of the citizen of the United States to attempt to sell a man at public auction, either in fee-simple or for a term of years. I propose to assume this and to enact a law which shall punish any violation of that constitutional provision.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say, before yielding for this amendment, that while I think this construction ought to be given as a matter of justice to the Congress and people of the United States, I also agree that we ought to impose penalties upon every man who takes part in a violation of the law which is presumed to have been established by the constitutional amendment. I shall probably adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I wish further time to examine it.

I desire, if possible, to get a unanimous expression from this House, whether or not they are in favor of this construction of the Constitution. Why, sir, every single step that any man in this body or out of it has taken to protect these southern people in what they call their "rights," every single movement that comes under the denomination of "magnanimity to the South," has been met by them with such action as has destroyed the political character and reputation of every man who has attempted to befriended them; they have destroyed every Republican who has attempted to hold back what have been called "radical" measures; they have destroyed the Democratic party, that has attempted to insist upon their immediate right of representation; and they will continue to destroy the political reputation of every man who attempts to stem this great current of civil rights and individual freedom throughout the United States.

And yet they come here and claim from us that they must have their State rights; that if they wish to sell negroes into slavery, we shall let them sell them; that if they wish to whip them into exclusion from all possible right of voting, we shall let them whip them into that condition; that if they wish to drive loyal men out of the South, we must let them drive them out of the South. And then, when we point to outrages like those to which I have referred, they come to us and say, "Why, you must not hold this community responsible for the act of an individual—a justice of the peace, or the judge of a single court."

Sir, I hold that for every organic expression of this hostility to the United States that community is to be held responsible. In my judgment there exists to-day in many parts of the South a rebellion against the lawful authority of the United States. They are attempting, by trickery and deception such as would do dishonor to that imaginary Yankee who is ever present in the brains of the South to-day, they are attempting, by that deception and trickery, odious and horrible in character, to defeat the wisest and most humane laws which we are passing for the protection of free citizens of the South. And if they tell me that it is not their organic will, and that we must not hold innocent men responsible for the acts of the guilty, I say to them, "Point me to your public press for any articles that denounce these outrages; point me to your political conventions that denounce them; point me to any public meetings that attempt to create a better public sentiment; point me to your pulpits that dare denounce outrages of life and limb to the innocent sufferer on account of his color; point me to your courts that construe one solitary law of the United States in the sense and interest it was designed to enforce and protect; do this, and then I will excuse the individual outrage; but until you do that, I hold the body organic and politic of the South responsible for the infamous crimes and misdemeanors they are daily perpetrating against what we regard as the rights of the citizen under the Constitution and the laws." When they shall thus reform their organic action, then they can come to us and ask for magnanimity in our treatment of them. But first they must take care that all free men, white or black, who adhere to the Government of the United States shall be protected as fully as one of their own class of citizens. Until that is done they have no claim to represent themselves in the Congress of the United States, for the simple reason that there is a continual moral, political, and organic rebellion going on in the South to-day, characterized by every act of rebellion except the act of armed and organized military resistance.

Mr. ROSS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if he is aware that there are some three thousand Indians held in slavery at this time in the Territories of New Mexico and Colorado?

Mr. KASSON. I understand they are held in what they call peonage, which is very like slavery, and this side of the House, within a few days past, has taken action with a view to remedy that evil.

Mr. ROSS. I am very glad to hear of it.

Mr. KASSON. And I have no doubt my excellent friend from Illinois [Mr. Ross] will have his name recorded against any action which will tend to abolish that system. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROSS. Is the gentleman aware that Government officers are owning and buying and selling these Indians in slavery in New Mexico and Colorado?

Mr. KASSON. If so, the President of the United States, as Chief of the Army, should take the advice of my friend and have them court-martialed for violating the Constitution and laws of the United States. [Laughter.] I hope the gentleman will advise the President in good faith to adopt that course. Sir, I wish we could convert my friend and all on his side of the House to an enlightened view of these subjects. Do they not see that they are daily descending into party ruin by attempting to oppose or ignore the great principles of human liberty and human progress? Do they not know that an idea of liberty and progress will ride right over any amount of Democratic flesh and crush it under its invisible wheels? There is nothing that can stand in the way of the progress of these ideas except folly, and that must be crushed as they go on to victory. Every party that chooses to stand in this country for an hour must adopt something at least of these progressive ideas. They must accept the new interpretations of the Constitution and laws that arise from a new condition of facts to which the Constitution and laws apply. The great infirmity of the executive administration to-day is, that it does not accept this light thrown upon the duties connected with their office. They adhere to opinions that were buried in the war, in the graves of the rebellion. The southern statesman has always been guided simply by formal dogmatic declarations from which he argued to results. The northern mind, the great loyal and Union intellect of the country, argues from ideas as the foundation of statesmanship, and hence has risen to power and will hold power supremely in this country until it abandons these ideas and crystallizes itself in arbitrary forms, without progress for the future. I make this earnest request—this supplication even—to my friends on the other side, in the interest of that freedom, which can be greatly aided by the unanimous action of this House, which will have its effect over all the people of this country, and even the judicial tribunals themselves, to take this step with us for the interest of personal liberty.

Now, sir, I desire a vote on this subject, and though I am willing to yield to other gentlemen I desire to retain the floor for the purpose of moving the previous question. I am ready to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER.] How much time does he desire?

Mr. THAYER. Not more than ten minutes.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Thirty minutes.

Mr. KASSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, the proposition which is embraced in the pending measure is, in my judgment, peremptorily demanded by the present circumstances of the country. It was to be apprehended, sir, I suppose, that an institution so deeply rooted as was the institution of slavery, which was for so many years apparently so invulnerable, and which, although it has received at the hands of the people of the United States its mortal wound, yet continues even amid the throes of its last agony to assert something of its former malignant power; I say it was to be apprehended that such an institution would even yet make some feeble struggles for vitality, in opposition to the great decision of the people against its future existence. We were prepared for it; and the occasion which calls for and demands the instant passage of the proposed law is one which we might naturally have anticipated.

Sir, we have been told by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] that legal proceedings have been instituted against the judge in Maryland who had the audacity, in the face of the constitutional amendment and in the face of the civil rights law, to offer for sale four human beings, citizens of the United States and protected by its laws. But, sir, does not the gentleman know that in the Senate of the State of Maryland a bill has already been introduced to indemnify that judge against the consequences of his unlawful conduct, and to save him harmless from the outrage which he has attempted to inflict under color of State law.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman will allow me to inquire whether he does not also know the fact that a bill has been introduced in the Maryland Senate for the purpose of repealing those provisions of the legislation of that State which now authorize penal slavery.

Mr. THAYER. I do not know how that is.

Mr. PHELPS. Such is the fact.

Mr. THAYER. I will say, in reply to my honorable friend, that, however that matter may be, I have been credibly informed that the statement I have made is the fact, and that the Legislature of Maryland in all probability is about to attempt, so far as it has the power so to do, to indemnify this cruel and insubordinate judge for his outrages against American citizenship.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to inquire of my friend from Pennsylvania, as a lawyer, whether that bill, if passed, would in any manner affect the legal right which the men sold would have to appeal to the courts.

Mr. THAYER. I will answer my friend. I do not know what the details of that bill may be; I have never seen it; but the information which I have received, that such a bill has been introduced into the Maryland Senate, is of a reliable character.

Mr. FINCK. One word more.

Mr. THAYER. I must ask the gentleman to excuse me, as my time has nearly expired. I have but a moment left, and I wish to explain to the House the object of my amendment. I was about saying when I was up before, that I have a repugnance to the passage of a law the sole object and purport of which is to construe an article of the Constitution of the United States. In my judgment, a law which is to enforce a particular construction of the Constitution of the United States should assume that that construction is not only the just and true construction, but the only construction—in a word, that the evil intended to be prevented by the proposed law is already prohibited by the Constitution. We do not sit here, sir, to enact general views in regard to what may or may not be the proper and legal construction of the Constitution of the United States. Nor would it be of any use to do so, for the evil would, notwithstanding our general abstractions, remain unpunished and unredressed. Now, sir, I propose as a substitute for the several declarations contained in the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio a law to enforce the Constitution of the United States; a law making those monstrous cruelties which are already plainly unconstitutional, and the perpetration of which is a violation of the dearest rights of citizenship, a crime punishable as a felony. I propose to rear an effectual safeguard in the future against these atrocious violations of the thirteenth article of the Constitution. Let us punish the offense; in that way we shall abolish it. The courts of the United States and the officers of the United States must be charged with the duty of enforcing the Constitution in this respect in their several jurisdictions, and those who violate the Constitution and insolently trample upon the rights and immunities which are guaranteed by it to the humblest citizen who dwells beneath its protecting shelter must be made, by adequate laws, to feel its power in the condign punishment which it can inflict. I propose, therefore, to strike out the pending resolution, leaving the preamble to stand as it is, and to substitute in the place of the resolution a law making this offense a felony against the United States, and punishable in the manner specified in my amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania, that perhaps his proposition covers all the points I desire, with one exception. It does not touch the case of those who are now held in bondage. I propose to modify it by inserting these words: "or who shall hereafter hold in servitude any person so sold."

Mr. THAYER. I accept that modification.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa accept the amendment, as modified, for his own resolution?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Iowa, in all its length and breadth, for on that question my opinion is very clear that the Government of this country, deriving its powers from the Constitution of the United States, is divided between the executive, legislative and judicial departments, that it is a Government of defined and limited powers, and that any enlargement or encroachment upon the part of any one of these departments beyond its constitutional province is an usurpation that ought not to be countenanced. I believe, sir, it is the province of the legislative department to make laws, of the executive to administer them, and of the judiciary to expound them. I do not believe that a proposition, such as I understand this one to be, assuming virtually upon the part of Congress the power and right to construe a provision of the Constitution admitted to be doubtful, is a legitimate exercise of the powers of this branch of the Government. For that reason, and for that reason only, I shall vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa.

But, sir, I wish it to be distinctly understood, while these are my views of the constitutional aspect of the question, I fully concur with him in the ideas he has suggested in regard to the necessity of some constitutional, proper legislation for the purpose of preventing that form of involuntary servitude known as penal slavery, or the sale of a convict's labor for crime. That legislation, in my opinion, belongs to the States concerned; and I have no hesitation in saying that, if I were a member of the Legislature of Maryland, I should promptly vote for a proposition involving the same principles that he has introduced here. Such a provision has already been introduced into the Legislature of that State. And I may be permitted to say there is no State of this Union which has accepted emancipation in better faith than the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. Maryland pioneered the path of constitutional emancipation for the General Government by the amendment of her own constitution, which preceded the action in the same direction of the Thirty-Eighth Congress. And it may be doubted whether the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery throughout the United States could have secured the requisite majority in the Thirty-Eighth Congress but for the impetus given to that movement by the example of Maryland.

In regard to the statute providing for involuntary servitude for crime, which has been brought into controversy, I have to say that, so far from the act referred to as passed by the Legislature of Maryland having been enacted in any spirit of hostility or opposition to the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, or to the constitutional provision incorporated into the organic act of that State, it is an old act, passed originally in 1835, amended and reenacted in 1858, and again amended and reenacted in 1862, by a Legislature the complexion of which gentlemen will understand when I tell them it was the one that raised money and regiments for the defense of the Government. It was that Legislature which reenacted that part of the code of Maryland, and that act was passed in the Senate by the vote of all the members but two, and in the House of Delegates by the vote of all but six, including in the majority many of the most eminent and conspicuous loyal men, even upon the radical side. I need do no more than mention as one who voted in the majority on that question the gentleman who was selected by Congress to deliver, before the two Houses and before the Supreme Court of the United States, a eulogy upon the life and character of my lamented predecessor, Mr. Davis.

Mr. KASSON. I do not understand in what year the action to which the gentleman refers was taken.

Mr. PHELPS. In 1862.

Mr. KASSON. Prior to the adoption of the constitutional amendment?

Mr. PHELPS. Prior, of course.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to state that my objection is not to what was done before, but that judges are adhering so closely to the old ideas, notwithstanding the amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman will pardon me for telling him that I think he has hardly followed me in my remarks, or has misapprehended their scope. The law to which he refers was not originally passed and is not now adhered to in any such spirit as is supposed by the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. Will my friend state whether or not these condemnations have not occurred under that law?

Mr. PHELPS. I have not come to the subject of those condemnations. I am about reaching that. They have certainly been made under that law. In regard to the particular cases to which the gentleman refers, it was a question of grave doubt in the minds of the judges before whom the question was brought whether, by the terms of the clause in the constitution of Maryland, which is in the same language as is contained in the ordinance of 1787 and in the constitutional amendment now under review, it was lawful for the State of Maryland to sell a person of color convicted of crime into involuntary servitude. And I can tell him that among those foremost in arguing that question in behalf of the power of the courts to decide that law were the prisoners' counsel themselves. In one case, at least, a gentleman prominently connected with the Freedmen's Bureau in Maryland, a well-known friend of the negro race, appealed to the court upon the ground of humanity to the negroes not to confine them within the walls of the penitentiary, which had been filled to overflowing by reason of the sudden emancipation—a large number of them persons reduced to vagrancy and theft—but to sell them for a limited time into involuntary servitude. Accordingly, in some cases, where there were extenuating circumstances, the sentence of imprisonment at hard labor was, as it was supposed by the prisoner, his friends, and the court, mitigated to a sale of the convict's labor for a limited period. It was, therefore, on the ground of humanity to the negro himself that this action was taken by the courts, and at the instance and advice of the prisoner's counsel and friends. Of the truth of this assertion I defy contradiction.

I am not here to oppose the adoption of any appropriate legislation which shall wipe away at once and forever every vestige of the institution of slavery. The people that I represent would not sustain me in assuming any such attitude on this floor, even if it were not repulsive to my own feelings and convictions. I desire simply to vindicate these people against unfounded, unjust, and uncalled for imputations.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELPS. Yes, sir.

Mr. THAYER. I wish to know whether the gentleman is in favor of or opposed to the humane practice which he has referred to; whether he is in favor of that system of law which requires humane people to buy their friends, or whether he is opposed to it.

Mr. PHELPS. I will answer the gentleman. If he had done me the honor to attend to the remarks I have been making it would not have been necessary for him to put that interrogatory. I have already said I am unequivocally opposed to the system of penal servitude, as to all other forms of human slavery, and if the occasion offered would, without a moment's hesitation, sanction any appropriate measure for its removal.

Mr. THAYER. I wish to say that my reason for asking the gentleman the question was because I understood him to eulogize the system, while in a few moments afterward he pronounced himself unconditionally opposed to it.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman misunderstood me entirely. If I had been the judge of the court I should have refused to accede to the request of the prisoners' counsel, and instead of ordering them into the custody of their friends for a limited period, under the nominal title of slaves, to range at liberty and commit other crimes, I would have consigned these negroes—I beg the gentleman's pardon; I do not know if it is in order now to call such persons negroes—I would have consigned these colored convicts to the penitentiary for such term of imprisonment at hard labor, within the limits prescribed by law, as their offenses deserved. But I can at the same time make allowance for the judge who presided, when appeals of the kind I have referred to, founded on motives of humanity, were made to him, for giving that construction to the law if his judgment approved it. I have said all I desire to say upon this question.

Mr. KASSON. I will yield for a moment to my colleague, [Mr. GRINNELL,] who desires to ask the gentleman from Maryland a question.

Mr. GRINNELL. I understood the gentleman from Maryland to eulogize the spirit and temper of the Maryland judiciary. I wish to inquire whether the statement is true, made by Judge Bond, that twelve churches and school-houses belonging to the colored people were burnt in that vicinity during a recent period?

Mr. PHELPS. We have had in our State unfortunately, as in every other State of the Union, cases of arson. There are vicious, turbulent, and lawless men in the State of Maryland as well as in every other State. I do not claim that all the people I represent are without exception either cherubim or seraphim or angels or the descendants of angels. I have heard that there have been such outrages as the gentleman has referred to. It was to be expected in the abrupt transition from a state of slavery to one of freedom that individual cases of aggression should occasionally occur on the part of thoughtless or reckless men.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would ask the gentleman whether any attempt has been made, to his knowledge, to arrest and punish those who committed these outrages? The assertion is made by the friends of the colored race in Maryland that there has been no attempt at a conviction of those who have driven these people from the temples of God and burnt their school-houses and churches. I state that against the spirit which he commends in Maryland and which I proclaim barbarism, and therefore I thank my colleague for the introduction of this resolution and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] for his amendment, which would punish by fine and imprisonment these outrages of the law.

Mr. KASSON. I was about to say, in response to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. PHELPS,] that if all his people are not cherubim and seraphim there ought to be a sufficient approximation to that condition—even if only two or three can be gathered together—there should be enough of the spirit of liberty and regard for individual rights among his people to condemn these outrages as against humanity and civilization. The difficulty is that no action of that community condemns them. This occasions the necessity for the Congress of the United States not only to condemn them but to legislate for their punishment. But for that no man more cheerfully than myself would leave the entire legislation to the people of the State, the majority of whom ought to have some regard for human rights.

Mr. PHELPS. I do not wish to intrude on the time or attention of the House, but I would simply say that there is no State within the limits of this Union the people of which exercise toward the unfortunate race to which the gentleman refers a kinder or more liberal and humane spirit than the State of Maryland. I venture to say for the district which I represent, comprehending the larger portion of the city of Baltimore, and for the whole city, that there has been at all times, and is now, as liberal, just, and friendly a spirit exhibited toward this colored race, and that the relations between that race and the white race have been as satisfactory and creditable to both as in any other city in this great country. And I will tell the gentleman further, in reply to the charges of arson in remote and thinly-settled portions of the State, that in the great city of New York, in one, two, and three days' of riot, at the very height and crisis of the war, when men were needed to suppress the rebellion and when the people of that city were called upon to furnish them, more colored men, women, and children were assaulted, outraged, and massacred, and more of their houses burned and sacked in that short period of time than have been done in the whole State of Maryland during the whole period since the war.

Mr. KASSON. But in the city of New York, if I remember rightly, the ringleaders of the riot were arrested, true bills were found against them, and they were tried, convicted, and imprisoned in the penitentiary of the State within thirty days from the commission of the offense. Can the gentleman point me to such action in the State of Maryland?

Mr. PHELPS. Yes, sir; many of such offenders there have been similarly punished.

Mr. KASSON. And has the property destroyed been paid for, as in New York? That is the distinction between a community organically opposed to such outrages and the community that tolerates them.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to obtain the action of this House upon this bill this morning. I think the measure has been sufficiently explained to meet the sentiments of the entire House, if their sentiments are in favor of the honest construction of the anti-slavery amendment to the Constitution. There is but one man that I know of in the United States to-day who has dared to propose a restoration of slavery, and he, I apprehend, must be some lunatic, found in the district of my friend from the Chicago district of Illinois, [Mr. WENTWORTH,] who has sent a memorial for that purpose to the Congress of the United States. Now, sir, I wish by the passage of this resolution, so far as it may, to put the question completely at rest in relation to the proper construction of this amendment to the Constitution.

Before I call the previous question, I ask unanimous consent to change the enacting clause from "Be it resolved," &c., to "Be it enacted," &c.; and to change the title so that it will read, "A bill to enforce the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

No objection was made.

Mr. KASSON. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

MESSRS. KASSON, SHANKLIN, NIBLACK, and TRIMBLE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 121, nays 25, not voting, 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. ALLEY, ALLISON, AMES, ARNELL, JAMES M. ASHLEY, BAKER, BALDWIN, BANKS, BARKER, BAXTER, BEAMAN, BENJAMIN, BERGEN, BIDWELL, BINGHAM, BLAINE, BOUTWELL, BRANDEGER, BROMWELL, BROOMALL, BUCKLAND, BUNDY, READER W. CLARKE, SIDNEY CLARKE, COBB, COOK, CULLUM, CULVER, DARLING, DAVES, DEFREES, DELANO, DEMING, DIXON, DODGE, DONNELLY, DRIGGS, ECKLEY, EGGLESTON, FARNSWORTH, FARQUHAR, FERRY, GARFIELD, GRINNELL, GRISWOLD, ABNER C. HARDING, HAWKINS, HAYES, HENDERSON, HIGBY, HILL, HOLMES, HOOPER, CHESTER D. HUBBARD, JOHN H. HUBBARD, JAMES R. HUBBELL, HUMPHREY, HUNTER, INGERSOLL, JENCKES, JULIAN, KASSON, KELLEY, KELSEY, KETCHAM, KOONTZ, KUYKENDALL, LATHAM, GEORGE V. LAWRENCE, WILLIAM LAWRENCE, LONGYEAR, LYNCH, MARSTON, MARVIN, MAYNARD, McCLURG, MCKEE, McRUE, MERCUR, MILLER, MORRILL, MOUTON, MYERS, NEWELL, O'NEILL, ORTH, PAINE, PATTERSON, PERHAM, PIKE, PLANTS, PRICE, RADFORD, WILLIAM H. RANDALL, RAYMOND, ALEXANDER H. RICE, JOHN H. RICE, ROSS, SAWYER, SCHENCK, SCOFFIELD, SPALDING, STARR, STOKES, NATHANIEL G. TAYLOR, THAYER, JOHN L. THOMAS, TROWBRIDGE, UPSON, VAN AERMAN, BURT VAN HORN, HAMILTON WARD, WARNER, ELIHU B. WASHBURN, HENRY D. WASHBURN, WELKER, WENTWORTH, WILLIAMS, JAMES F. WILSON, STEPHEN F. WILSON, WINDOM, and WINFIELD—122.

NAYS—Messrs. ANCONA, CAMPBELL, COOPER, DAWSON, ELDRIDGE, FINCK, GLOSSBRENNER, AARON HARDING, HISE, HOGAN, KERR, LEFTWICH, MCCULLOUGH, NIBLACK, NICHOLSON, NOELL, PHELPS, SAMUEL J. RANDALL, RITTER, ROGERS, SHANKLIN, SROUSE, TABER, TRIMBLE, and ANDREW H. WARD—25.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. ANDERSON, DELOS R. ASHLEY, BLOW, BOYER, CHANLER, CONKLING, DAVIS, DENISON, DUMONT, ELIOT, GOODYEAR, HALE, HARRIS, HART, HOTCHKISS, ASABEL W. HUBBARD, DEMAS HUBBARD, EDWIN N. HUBBELL, HUBBARD, JOHNSON, JONES, LAFIN, LE BLOND, LOAN, MARSHALL, MCINDOE, MOORHEAD, MORRIS, POMEROY, ROLLINS, ROUSSEAU, SHELLBARGER, SIT-

GRAVES, SLOAN, STEVENS, STILLWELL, NELSON TAYLOR, FRANCIS THOMAS, THORNTON, ROBERT T. VAN HORN, WILLIAM B. WASHBURN, WHALEY, WOODBRIDGE, and WRIGHT—44.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BURNING OF THE NEW IRONSIDES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to what I suppose to be a privileged question. Prior to the late recess of Congress the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which I am a member, was charged by the House with the duty of investigating the facts connected with the destruction by fire of the United States steamer New Ironsides in the Delaware river. It is necessary for a proper and thorough investigation of those facts that the committee should go to Philadelphia and be absent for a few days. I therefore ask the leave of this House for the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs to be absent, say from Thursday morning until the beginning of next week.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to ask if it is desired that the whole of the committee shall go.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is to be optional with the members of the committee.

There being no objection, leave was accordingly granted.

PURCHASES BY ORDNANCE OFFICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the acts of April 21, 1808, and March 3, 1809, a statement of the purchases made by the Ordnance office during the year ending December 31, 1866; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S CONTRACTS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the acts of April 21, 1808, and July 17, 1862, the contracts made by the Quartermaster General from July 1, 1866, to December 31, 1864; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN NEW YORK CITY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior and Acting Postmaster General, transmitting the report of the commission appointed under a resolution of Congress, approved May 16, 1866, to inquire concerning a suitable site for buildings for courts and post office in New York city; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ROCK AND ILLINOIS RIVERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of January 3, 1867, the report of the chief of engineers on the subject of the surveys of the Rock and Illinois rivers; which was, on motion of Mr. WENTWORTH, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MINERAL RESOURCES OF THE WEST.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a preliminary report by Mr. J. Ross Browne upon the mineral resources of the States and Territories west of the Rocky mountains; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING REVENUE DOCUMENTS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, reported from the Committee on Printing the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House twenty thousand copies of the report of the special commissioner of the revenue, and ten thousand copies of the form of bill accompanying the same; and for the use of the Treasury Department one thousand copies of the report, and five hundred copies of the form of bill.

BREAKWATER AT CRESCENT CITY, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIDWELL. I desire, by unanimous consent, to move the printing of the memorial presented this morning relative to a breakwater at the port of Crescent City, California.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object. I see no necessity for printing things of this sort.

Mr. BIDWELL. There is great necessity for it.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 543, to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] is entitled to the floor. The pending question is on the motion to refer the bill and amendments to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, in the spring of 1865 the military forces of the late confederate States of America surrendered themselves as prisoners of war to the arms of the Federal Government. As a civil power the pretended confederacy then ceased to exist, and the Commander-in-Chief of the forces of the United States took military possession of the conquered country. That year and the next have passed away, and yet, except in the case of Tennessee, the supreme power of the conqueror has done nothing to relieve the subjugated people from their condition as prisoners of war, nothing to give them civil governments, or to enable them to form such governments for themselves.

It is not without cause that all parties in the South complain of this unreasonable delay. It is not without cause that the friends of the Executive reproach the national Legislature with condemning his policy without setting up something in its stead. We accuse the President of having surrendered the fruits of our victories to the enemy, yet we take no steps to rescue them out of his hands. We charge the President with having deserted our allies, the loyal men of the South, and placed them under the control of organizations as thoroughly rebel as those which formed constituent parts of the late confederacy, yet we content ourselves with simply inquiring into and publishing the enormities daily perpetrated by those organizations and the men who uphold them. We know that the loyal people of the South have no protection for life or property. We know that they are being murdered by hundreds for no other offense than that of having fought on the side of their country, and the fact that they wear its uniform is the sufficient evidence against them. We know that a convention of unarmed men, met under the guarantee of the Constitution of the United States to deliberate on public affairs, has been dispersed by violence and its members shot down in the public streets in open day by those who pretended to act under the authority of the Government, yet we do nothing to provide tribunals and laws for the adequate punishment of the perpetrators of these deeds.

Surely the time has come for action. The loyal citizen of the United States, residing in the territory which he aided to reclaim from the public enemy, has a right to demand protection at the hands of his Government. We are called upon to act by the duty, which even savages recognize, of shielding allies against a common foe. We are called upon by our condition as conquerors to give civil governments to the conquered. We are called upon by our immense national debt to organize the South, that its resources may be developed, and thereby may aid in lessening the public burdens.

The bill now before the House proposes to relieve the inhabitants of the conquered country from their condition as prisoners of war, and to declare all of them citizens of the United States except a small minority of the more active participants in the late rebellion. It proposes to treat these people in the manner most favorable to themselves, to consider them residents of territory within the limits of the United States and not embraced in any organized State. It proposes to enable them to form for themselves State governments, to be admitted into the Union on a footing with the other States thereof as soon as they shall have been ascertained to be republican in form and so constituted as to secure equal rights to all citizens.

It provides a process similar to the naturalization of persons of foreign birth by which those exempted from the general operation of the bill may become again citizens of the United States. This class embraces the comparatively small number who voluntarily accepted office under the late confederacy, and took upon themselves its allegiance by actual oath, and who cannot now swear that on and at all times after March 4, 1864, they desired to return to their old allegiance, and that they gave no voluntary aid or encouragement to the rebellion after that date.

The right to place these men on a footing with men of foreign birth cannot be denied. We have always maintained the right of expatriation. Any American citizen may lawfully renounce his allegiance and take upon himself that of another Government, but it is only at our option that he may do so and still remain in the country. The crime of these men was not the formation of the southern confederacy. To that there could be no legal or actual objection. Their crime was the taking of our soil, our property, forming their new government within our borders. If they had established it within the limits of Mexico, as some of their predecessors once did, it might have still existed, and that without cause of complaint on our part unless we were bound to prevent it by treaty stipulations with Mexico. In that event surely they would, at least at our option, have ceased to be American citizens. True, their government has fallen, but this was no merit of theirs. They did what they could to establish it, and it is not for them to say that it never had a legal existence. In short, we but take them at their word. They declared themselves no longer citizens of the United States. They acted against us upon that declaration. We admit it, and they are estopped from denying it now.

It is urged against the bill under consideration that it proposes to destroy existing State governments, and to create new ones in their stead, and that this is beyond the constitutional power of Congress. This objection is based upon the assumption that there are existing State governments in the territory reclaimed from the military forces of the late confederacy. Let us examine the foundation for this assumption. Take the case of North Carolina, and that pretended State stands upon precisely the same footing with all the others. If the organization existing in that district of the conquered country is a State of the Union in the sense in which that term has always been understood it must be either because it was a party to the original compact or because it has been admitted to participation in that compact by legitimate authority since. If it ever was a State of the Union it is necessary also that nothing which has since transpired should have deprived it of its rights as a member of the compact. These positions will not be controverted. To fix upon its legal status all that is needed therefore is to consult its history.

There was a State of North Carolina, a party to the original compact. Let us admit for the present that this organization is that one. Under this view the inquiry will be: has it lost its position by anything which has transpired since?

In 1861 North Carolina passed an ordinance of secession dissolving the connection with her fellow States. It is urged that this ordinance was void. I grant it, and I grant, too, that if no act had followed the ordinance, North Carolina would still be a State of the Union. But she took up arms to maintain by force what she had resolved by legislation. She formed an alliance with other States and levied public war against the Government. These acts, however wrongful, were not void. It is a fact not to be explained away that war existed for four long years, and that she and her allies constituted one belligerent and the Government of the country the other. Now, the existence of war, according to all the writers upon public law, terminates all treaties, all compacts, puts an end to all civil relations that existed between the belligerents and the ending of the war of itself does not revive them.

If the war terminates by treaty, the treaty fixes the future relations of the parties. If it terminates by conquest, the law of nations fixes those future relations. That law holds the conquered to be mere prisoners of war with no civil rights whatever as against the conqueror. It was certainly competent for the war to end by treaty, and if it had done so, what lawyer would now look to the Constitution of the United States for the present status of North Carolina? If the supposed treaty had restored the status ante bellum, then, indeed, the Constitution would be looked to to ascertain that status, but when ascertained it would be founded upon the treaty and nothing else. Ending, as the war actually did, by victory on the one side and unconditional submission on the other, the laws of war leave the parties as the war leaves them until the supreme power of the conqueror grants civil rights to the conquered.

It is sometimes alleged that the surrender of the rebels was not unconditional, and an attempt has been made in certain quarters to give the terms of the surrender the force and effect of a treaty restoring the status ante bellum. This position is too absurd for serious consideration. The surrender was as prisoners of war, than which nothing can be more unconditional. And if this were not so, who gave the commanding General the power to make such a treaty, either in terms or by implication? Who gave the President the power to make such a treaty or indeed any other, except with the consent of the Senate? General Grant knew his duty as a soldier too well to usurp the highest law-making power of the country, the right to make treaties. His power to contract with the enemy was limited to the purposes and the duration of the war, and he did not transcend that power.

It is contended by some that the State of North Carolina did not rebel; that during the war the State remained loyal, but with its functions suspended, and that only the citizens rebelled. This is a possible assertion, but it is not true. Individual citizens do not levy war. Rebellions are organized bodies of men, not necessarily States, nor even preëxisting organizations; but always organizations. It is a question of fact, to be settled by the history of the times, whether the organization that rebelled in North Carolina was or was not the State. It claimed to be the State. It performed the functions of the State. It had the necessary elements of the State. It was the only similar organization within its limits; the only organization within its limits that possessed executive, judicial, and legislative departments. Its various offices were held and exercised by those who had held and exercised the corresponding offices of the State, and their successors. If it was not the original State wrongfully out of its line of duty and in rebellion against the Government, it is difficult to conceive what it was, and where and what that State was whose functions it was performing.

The State of North Carolina did rebel, did repudiate the Constitution of the United States, did form an alliance with the public enemy, did levy war against the Government, and finally did become reduced to the condition of a conquered province by our victorious arms. Did she lose no rights by all this? Did the mere fact of rebellion suppressed remit her back to all her old privileges as a member of the Union? She violated the compact. Is this attended with no forfeiture? Can a State of the Union thus play with her rights and duties; thus violate the one without losing the other? Is her condition as a party to the compact a thing like a garment, to be put off and on at will? Common sense and the common law of nations justify the statement of the whole matter in a single plain proposition: she broke the compact and therefore can claim no rights under it.

This conclusion results from the hypothesis that the present body-politic is the old State of North Carolina, but the hypothesis is not true. The friends of the President say a State cannot be destroyed; "once a State always a State" is their favorite theory. It might be interesting to debate this as an abstract proposition, but when we find the State actually destroyed an argument for or against its eternal duration would be labor thrown away. Physicians do not dispute about the mortality of the disease over the dead body of the patient.

The President of the United States in his proclamation of May 29, 1865, uses the following language:

"The rebellion which was waged by a portion of the people of the United States against the properly constituted authorities of the Government thereof, in the most violent and revolting form, but whose organized and armed forces have now been almost entirely overcome, has in its revolutionary progress deprived the people of the State of North Carolina of all civil government."

To make sure that the President means what his language imports, that the organization theretofore known as the State of North Carolina had ceased to exist, I quote from the same proclamation, the following:

"Now, therefore, in obedience to the high and solemn duties imposed upon me by the Constitution of the United States, and for the purpose of enabling the loyal people of the said State to organize a State government whereby justice may be established, domestic tranquillity insured, and loyal citizens protected in their rights of life, liberty, and property, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, do hereby appoint William W. Holden, provisional governor of the State of North Carolina," &c.

Here is the assertion as plain as language can make it, that somehow or other the State of North Carolina, that was a party to the old compact, had ceased to exist; and although it rests upon the declaration of Andrew Johnson, it is nevertheless true. The forces of the United States had crushed out the old body-politic and driven away those who had performed its functions, leaving the people, considered in the best possible aspect for themselves, as so many citizens of the United States occupying territory within the limits of the United States and not embraced within any organized State.

It is only in this capacity that the people of North Carolina could be enabled to create a State de novo, as they were invited to do by the proclamation, by meeting in their primary capacities and electing delegates to a convention to frame a constitution and form of government. Such a convention did meet and did perform the functions assigned to it by the proclamation, and the body-politic now claiming rights under the old compact is the creature of that convention.

I admit that the convention took up the old form of government and adapted it to their purposes by modification, and they might have taken the constitution of Pennsylvania as a groundwork and changed it to suit them. I repeat, it is the organization that came from their hands which is here claiming rights. Now, the creature of the convention can have no legal status except upon the hypothesis that the convention was a legal body, and the convention could not have been a legal body except upon the hypothesis that the old State had ceased to exist.

Grant, for the benefit of the argument of the opposition, that the President could do what he attempted and what it has always been supposed could only be done by act of Congress, that is to say, could enable citizens of the United States to organize a State government. Very certain it is that neither Congress nor the President can enable citizens of the United States to organize a State government within the limits of an organized State. A different question would have been presented if the action had been by the Legislature of the State pursuant to its laws and the design to change a form of government already existing. The product might then have been the old State or its legitimate successor. But this was not done, and the champions of the present body-politic are involved in this dilemma, either that the convention was an illegal body and its creature a non-entity, or that the old State had ceased to exist when the convention was called, and that the present one never was a party to the old compact and can claim no rights under it.

Let me now ask, what is the difference in condition and legal rights between the body-politic claiming to be admitted to the rights of the State of North Carolina and that asking recognition as the State of Nebraska? Both were formed by the people of the respective districts, or some of them, of their own motion and without enabling acts. In the case of Nebraska such an act was passed, but the citizens saw fit to reject it, and some time afterward, in a totally different manner, that is to say, by and through the territorial Legislature prepared, submitted to the people, and are now presenting here their constitution and form of government. As the territorial Legislature had no power to act in the premises, the legal result is that the whole matter comes from the people of the Territory without an enabling act.

In the case of North Carolina there was no enabling act whatever. It is true there was the President's proclamation, but nobody who does not hold a lucrative office at the will of the President would concede to that the force and effect of an act of Congress. In that document the Executive gives himself his twofold title of President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, as if uncertain in which capacity he was acting and too anxious for the end to leave out any source of power. In his civil capacity, it is very clear he had no power to create States by proclamation, or to enable citizens of the United States to create them. In his military capacity, his functions are limited to carrying out the laws of war, and a law of war which empowers the head of an army as such to create civil government is something new in the history of legal science.

Before any action was had in either of these communities, the people composing each occupied precisely the same legal position, not taking into the account the fact, immaterial in the present argument, that in one of them very many of the people had been guilty of high crimes. In both cases the inhabitants were citizens of the United States. In both they occupied territory within the limits of the United States, and in both they had no organized State government.

Does it alter the case that in North Carolina a State government had previously existed? Certainly not, unless the present organization is its legitimate successor. But it is not. History is clear upon that point. The old State contained in its constitution a provision by which that instrument could be changed even to the making of a new government. It had to be done by act of the Legislature, passed by both branches of the body by a vote of three fifths of the members; advertised six months before the next meeting of the Legislature; passed again by a vote of two thirds of both branches, and finally ratified by a vote of the people. In this manner, and this only, could a State government be organized possessing the rights of the old one or being its legitimate successor.

But there was no Legislature. Its members had been driven from their seats as felons never to meet again. There was no executive. The Governor had been deposed and banished. There was no judiciary. The courts had been broken up and the judges threatened with imprisonment if they should ever again attempt to exercise their functions. In fact, the whole body-politic had been destroyed and the people were "without civil government."

Where then is the legal difference between the cases of Nebraska and North Carolina? There is none—certainly none in favor of the latter. Both require congressional legislation to give them the rights of States, and Congress may admit both, reject both, or admit either, and reject the other.

I have already said that the pretensions of the other organizations now claiming to be States rest upon precisely the same legal grounds with those of North Carolina. If they come as old States, former members of the compact, claiming reinstatement in their old position, the answer is: they have broken faith with their cocontractors, violated the articles of copartnership, so to speak, and cannot have them renewed except with the consent of the other parties. If they come as new States, as their history would indicate, gotten up under the authority of the President's proclamations, the answer is: first, new States cannot be created in that manner; and second, new States have no rights under the Constitution until they are conferred by legislation.

It is said that this line of argument admits the right of secession, admits that the States in question have succeeded in getting out of the Union, notwithstanding the fact that the war waged to prevent it has resulted in success on our side. Those who raise this objection are involving themselves in a series of blunders. We never denied the physical power of a State to secede; we never denied its physical power to violate the Constitution and to set up an independent sovereignty within our borders. Nothing but the experiment could settle that question. We resolved that these States should not form a new government within our territory, and we succeeded in preventing it. But it does not follow that the States so violating the Constitution have lost no rights under it. It does not even follow that they have survived the clash of arms.

The States, in the sense of people and territory, are still within the limits of the United States, and therefore not "out of the Union." It is only that their organizations have ceased to be component parts of the Government of the United States.

The war was not waged to keep the rebel States from losing any of their rights under the Constitution. They had already renounced those rights under the delusive hope of getting something better by an appeal to arms. This something better they attempted to get from us and we resisted the attempt with success. The war was not waged on our part to prevent the rebels from doing injury to themselves, but to prevent them from doing injury to us. The result, therefore, does not reinstate them in the positions they renounced, though they have failed to secede, in fact, and are not "out of the Union."

The important feature of the bill under consideration is that which proposes to give the people of the States lately in rebellion governments strictly republican in form, by giving to every adult male who has not disqualified himself by crime the right of suffrage. The precise meaning of that clause of the Constitution which requires Congress to guaranty to every State a republican form of government has never been judicially determined, and every Senator and Representative who takes upon himself the obligation to support the Constitution must interpret that clause so as to satisfy his own conscience.

What is a republican form of government? If I were to attempt a definition it would be this: it is that form of government in which the rulers are chosen by the suffrages of the people, and in which every citizen may either exercise the right of suffrage himself or have it exercised for him by some one who may be fairly considered as representing his interests by reason of legal, social, or family relations to him. Under this definition, if the right of suffrage be exercised by all the adult males, the women and children may be considered as mediately represented in the government, and hence the form would be republican. But it would meet the requirements of the definition much better if the right of suffrage were extended to all adults without regard to sex; and I am ready to advocate this extension whenever the women of America shall believe themselves unfairly treated by this mediate representation and shall demand the right of suffrage for themselves.

I ask now with what kind of consistency can the government of South Carolina, now so imperiously demanding recognition here, be considered republican in form when four out of every seven adult males are denied the right of suffrage? Who represents the interests of the four? Who represents the interests of their wives and children? Under the slave system there was at least the pretense of mediate representation. The slave in contemplation of law occupied the position of the apprentice, the minor. He was a part of the family of the master, and to the dominant southern mind was considered as fairly represented in the government by the head of the family. Recent events have demonstrated that the slave himself looked upon the matter in a different light. But the slave system has passed away and the farce of mediate representation of the negroes has gone with it. The late slave and the late master stand upon the same legal footing, and as well might the former claim the right of voting for the both as the latter. We must now either violate our obligations to support the Constitution or we must refuse to recognize as republican in form any State government which denies the right of suffrage to any of its adult male citizens who are not disqualified by crime.

If it be said that this argument applies with equal force to my own State I admit it, and with some sense of humiliation. Possibly, as but one in sixty is there excluded from participation in the government, the maxim de minimis non curat lex might reconcile easy consciences. But Pennsylvania was liable to no such reproach when she became a party to the compact. That anti-republican principle was incorporated in her constitution afterward by the same political party that would have built up an aristocracy of race in the South.

But gentlemen on the other side of the House say that this is a white man's Government, and they raise their hands with an affectation of holy horror at the idea of extending political rights to the negroes. Do they not know that our Government is emphatically the Government of the governed? And are none but white men governed by it? Do they not know that at the time of the adoption of our Constitution negroes voted in every State of the Union but one? Do they not know that members of the Convention that framed that instrument were voted for by negroes, and that there was no law and no principle of our institutions which would have prevented a negro from sitting in that Convention if he had been duly elected? Do they not know that there is not now and that there never has been any law to prevent a negro from holding the office of President of the United States if he should be otherwise qualified?

These gentlemen would like to make this a white man's Government. They seem actuated by a fear of the negro amounting to monomania. Negro equality is Banquo's ghost to them, and if ever the negro should outstrip them in the race of civilization it will be no fault of theirs that he has had the opportunity. They will point, upward of course, to the dusky column and exclaim—

"Thou canst not say I did it."

These gentlemen know best what their chances would be in a fair and even race with the negro under equal laws, and if they really fear his competition it is but just to them to admit that they have good reason to fear it. It may not serve to allay their terror of negro equality to remind them that the American negro has advanced in civilization more within two hundred years than their own race has within two thousand.

With an affectation of consistency that might well be envied, the same men who exhibit this fear of fair competition with the negro under equal laws object to his right of voting on account of his ignorance. There is doubtless a great degree of ignorance among the negroes of the South; but who is responsible for it? Not they. Until recently it was a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment in every one of the States lately in rebellion to teach negroes to read. Even the Bible was by law a sealed book to them. Certain portions of it, selected with especial reference to the pecuniary advantage of their masters, might be read to them by judicious ministers of the Gospel; but if some simple-minded philanthropist should attempt to open its full light upon their benighted understandings it would be well for him if he could obtain the advantage of the punishment meted to his crime by law, and thereby avoid the hemp and the bowie-knife.

But I deny that any man should be deprived of political rights on account of his ignorance. Governments are intended to equalize, as far as possible, the weak with the strong, the poor with the rich, the ignorant with the intelligent. Political rights are intended to enable men to preserve that portion of their natural rights which is the especial object of government; that is to say their civil rights of life, liberty, and property; and the only valid reason that can be urged for denying political rights to any man is that he is capable of preserving his civil rights without them.

Can the negro in the South preserve his civil rights without political ones? Let the convention riot of New Orleans answer; let the terrible three days in Memphis answer. In the latter city three hundred negroes who had periled their lives in the service of their country and still wore its uniform, were compelled to look on while the officers of the law, elected by white men, set their dwellings in flames and fired upon their wives and children as they escaped from the doors and windows. Their churches and school-houses were burned because they were their churches and school-houses. Outrages which the tongue refuses to describe in language, were perpetrated upon their women; and the dead mother, who was killed because she resisted, and her living child were thrown together into the flames of the building that was burned because it had afforded them a home. Yet no arrest, no conviction, no punishment awaits the perpetrators of these deeds, who walk in open day and boast of their enormities, because, forsooth, this is a white man's Government.

Let it not be said that these occurrences are unusual and extraordinary. The history of the last eighteen months will exhibit their parallel in every State and in every city of the subjugated South; and the present organizations in that territory, the base offspring of northern perfidy and southern treason, cannot, and will not, afford the adequate remedy. It is quite time that this Government should recognize the rights of the black man, and should arm him with the ballot, that he may not be compelled to arm himself with the pistol and the knife in defense of those whom his duty to his God requires that he should defend.

Certain gentlemen have made the strange discovery that the extension of the right of suffrage to negroes will render them eligible to office; and they ask with an air of confidence, as if the question contained an unanswerable argument, how we would like to sit in this House with a black Representative? Well, if we have been content to sit here with gamblers and lottery brokers, it is too late to become fastidious now. These gentlemen make the mistake which, it is charitable to suppose, was made by a distinguished Cabinet officer in his letter directing the people of the United States not to sanction the pending constitutional amendment. They suppose that there is some necessary connection between the right of suffrage and eligibility to office; such that, granting or withholding the one of itself, grants or withholds the other. No position can be more unsound. Women and minors may hold office under the Government of the United States, but may not vote. Men between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-five may vote, but may not hold the office of Representative in Congress. Naturalized foreigners may vote, but are not eligible to the Presidency.

In fact, the principle they so much dread in the future is already part and parcel of the laws of the land. A negro, otherwise properly qualified, is now and always has been eligible to Congress. Nothing but the want of a due election prevents any of our seats from being now occupied by black Representatives. This question has been always heretofore left with the citizens of the several congressional districts. They have repeatedly elected worse men than an average negro, but they have never yet elected a negro.

Of the eight million inhabitants of the country lately in rebellion, five millions may be considered as devotedly attached to the cause of the Government, and the remaining three millions are as inimical to it as they were in the proudest days of the confederacy. Of the five millions but one million and a half are white. By limiting political power to the white element alone, therefore, an average preponderance of two to one will be given to the enemies of the Government. The object of the bill under consideration is to place the destinies of the South in the hands of the entire eight millions, in order that the loyal majority may protect themselves and the country against their and its implacable foes, rendered more deadly hostile by their humiliating defeat in the field. A measure so just, so reasonable, and so necessary cannot fail to receive the sanction of Congress.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BROOMALL. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will detain the gentleman but a moment. I wish to make a suggestion at this point to see how he will meet it. As I understand his remarks, he estimates that of the southern people, supposed to be eight millions in all, the loyal portion numbers about five millions and the disloyal about three millions. He proposes to put governmental control into the hands of the whole of them, supposing that the loyal five millions will more than counterbalance the disloyal three millions. This undoubtedly would be the fact if the loyal and disloyal were distributed in the same proportion throughout the entire South. The suggestion to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman is, that the two classes of population are not distributed everywhere in the same proportion; that in some localities the loyal sentiment is largely predominant, while in many other localities the rebel spirit has the decided preponderance. To leave the loyal men, white and black, in any community subject to the domination of the rebel element would place them in an attitude which the gentleman can well understand from the part which he took in an investigation in my own State. Take, for example, my own State, some portions of which are very largely loyal, while in others the predominant temper is of that malignantly disloyal type of which the gentleman himself saw the evidences. I would ask him how he would meet that state of things, if he proposes to place the government in the hands of the whole population, without discrimination as to loyalty or disloyalty?

Mr. BROOMALL. I see the difficulty presented by the gentleman from Tennessee, and I can only say in answer to him that the bill to some extent provides against it by disfranchising a portion, probably too small a portion, of the rebel element; certainly the most malignant portion. If the gentleman will propose such an alteration as will remedy the difficulty, he will have my assistance.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will call the gentleman's attention to a principle we enunciated in this House this morning in the District suffrage bill, for that bill is based on the principle of loyal suffrage, irrespective of race or color.

Mr. BROOMALL. If the loyal men of the South ask the disfranchisement of every rebel, they have the right to require it at our hands, and I for one will grant it to them as far as my vote goes. No loyal man, of any race or color, should be subjected to the rule of the disloyal without his consent. A thorough remedy for the evil in all localities by general law is probably impracticable at the present time.

If there is any significance in the late verdict of the people—the tribunal of final resort upon all political questions—it is, that the civil authorities shall not surrender to the rebels all that was gained by arms at so much cost of blood and treasure, and upon so many battle-fields; that our Government dare not, in the face of the nations of the world, desert its allies in the South, of whatever caste or lineage, nor make peace with the enemy, except upon terms satisfactory to them; and finally, that treason is odious, and though it may be pardoned by a faithless Executive, it is still treason, and as such shall never be allowed to disgrace any official position, State or national; and the man who undertakes to stay execution of the judgment upon this verdict had better ask the history of his country in mercy to omit his name from its pages.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the House will not take out of my time what has been consumed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was ready to proceed while the gentleman from Ohio was not, and that the latter will be entitled to the floor for one hour on next Tuesday, to which time the subject has been postponed.

MRS. SALLIE GRIDER.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, directed to pay Mrs. Sallie Grider, widow of Henry Grider, deceased, late a member of this House, the amount of compensation unpaid and due to said Henry Grider, as a member of this House at the time of his death, on the 7th of September, 1866.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman to amend the resolution by making it include the extra compensation, so as to save all further question.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I accept that modification.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill concerning judicial proceedings; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ASSAY OFFICE IN ST. LOUIS.

Mr. HOGAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish an office in the city of St. Louis for the assay of gold and silver; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

INCREASED PAY OF CLERKS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution No. 224, relating to the increased pay of clerks, may now be taken up and put on its passage. It is the special order, and will take but a few moments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to postpone all previous orders.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten minutes to four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rules, and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of Madison Newton, asking allowance for extraordinary medical expenses and personal attention caused by wounds of his son received in the service.

By Mr. ALLISON: The petition of the McGregor Western Railroad Company for aid to extend their road from O'Brien county, Iowa, to Yankton, Dakota, &c.

Also, the petition of 100 citizens of Clermont, Fayette county, Iowa, protesting against contraction of the currency, &c.

By Mr. AMES: The petition of Harvey T. Litchfield, for change of name of steamer Eveline to Nantasket.

By Mr. BALDWIN: The petition of the Worcester Horse Railroad Company, for relief from internal revenue tax on gross receipts.

Also, the petition of citizens of Grafton, Massachusetts, concerning the currency and the national banks.

By Mr. BANKS: The memorial of Charles Colburn, of Massachusetts, to be compensated for services as yeoman on board the United States receiving ship Ohio during the year 1845, and subsequently.

By Mr. BERMAN: The petition of J. B. Bloss and Moses W. Field, of Detroit, Michigan, praying that Congress will refrain from the passage of any act authorizing a curtailment of the national currency.

Also, the petition of Henry Underwood, and others, jurors, serving in the district and circuit courts of the United States sitting at Detroit, Michigan, praying for increased compensation.

Also, the petition of George R. Smith, of Detroit, Michigan, praying for the passage of the bankrupt bill now pending in Congress.

Also, the report of the Board of Trade of the city of Detroit, touching the subject of registering Canadian-built vessels in the United States, remonstrating against granting further concessions to the owners of foreign-built ships, and recommending that all articles of American manufacture for ships be free from excise or internal revenue taxes.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of Emil Scheurman, and 20 others, citizens of Saginaw, Michigan, praying for a reduction of tax on cigars.

By Mr. DARLING: The petition of Samuel & I. Schiffer, merchants in New York city, praying compensation for leather held by them in payment of debts due them at Savannah, Georgia, and taken and sold by the United States.

By Mr. ECKLEY: The petition of citizens of Wells-ville, Ohio, against any decrease of national currency, and against requiring the national banks to redeem their circulation in the city of New York.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: The petition of a large number of the citizens of Aurora, Kane county, Illinois, for impeachment of Andrew Johnson, acting President of the United States.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The memorial of J. D. Moore and John N. Moulder, hospital stewards, United States Army, asking that the act of July 28, 1866, may be amended and made applicable to soldiers remaining in service after that date.

By Mr. HOLMES: The petition of Smith & Post, of Oswego, New York, for American registers for Canadian-built vessels Champlain, Hookelagu, Monarch, Sea Gull, and Smith & Post.

By Mr. HUMPHREY: The petition of Colonel E. W. Benson, and 1,400 others, citizens and tax-payers of Buffalo, New York, asking for the passage of a law granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812.

By Mr. HUNTER: The memorial of R. L. Allen, R. H. Allen & Co., John W. Douglass, Edward B. Leverich, and others, against the increase of duties upon importations of steel.

By Mr. INGERSOLL: The petition of William E. Phelps, S. M. Farren, H. P. Tracy, and others, citizens of Elmwood, Illinois, protesting against the passage of any act for the reduction of the currency, or any act requiring the national banks to redeem their circulation in the city of New York.

By Mr. KELLEY: The memorial of 766 loyal Union citizens of Arkansas, praying that in view of the unwillingness of the late insurrectionists in that State to render a prompt compliance with the measures taken by the loyal people of this nation, Congress do declare the unrecognized government of the State of Arkansas, as at present existing, abolished and of no effect; and to confer upon the loyal people of that State, and such other persons as may be deemed worthy, the authority to reorganize a State government upon a basis which shall insure to its loyal citizens, without regard to color, the full enjoyment of their rights and privileges, &c.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: The petition of citizens of Lawrence county, Pennsylvania, asking for the passage of an increase of duties on foreign goods.

By Mr. MARVIN: The petition of L. L. Dean, John Carmichael, Henry Quithot, and others, citizens of Amsterdam, Montgomery county, New York, protesting against the act compelling national banks to redeem in New York, and against any contraction of the currency.

Also, a petition of similar import from T. N. Miller & Co., G. A. Streeter & Co., and many others, citizens of Johnston, Fulton county, New York.

By Mr. MOULTON: The petition of citizens of Assumption, Christian county, Illinois, praying that Congress refrain from any curtailment of the currency.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The memorial of General Grant, Major General Meade, and others, officers of the United States Army, respectfully asking that when officers are withdrawn from active service and placed on the retired list, under existing laws, they may be allowed, in addition to their pay, their service or longevity rations, which is one ration per day for every five years' service.

By Mr. PAINE: The memorial of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union of Washington, District of Columbia, asking for an investigation into the affairs of the Government Printing Office.

Also, the memorial of Joseph Henry, George G. Meade, J. E. Hilgard, Charles Whittlesey, and I. A. Lapham, a committee of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, for the publication of the Lake Surveys in separate form.

By Mr. PRICE: The petition of manufacturers and dealers in cigars, and dealers in and growers of seed-leaf tobacco, asking for a modification of the internal revenue law in reference to the same.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of Major General Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant General United States Army, praying that he may be allowed double rations.

Also, the petition of 30 officers of the United States Army, praying that officers placed on the retired list may be allowed to retain their longevity rations.

By Mr. RAYMOND: The memorial of Major General Hooker, and other military officers, praying for a continuance of service or longevity rations to officers placed on the retired list, in addition to the pay now allowed.

By Mr. UPSON: The petition of David Lillianfield, and others, of Kalamazoo, Michigan, praying for a reduction of the tax on cigars.

By Mr. WENTWORTH: The petition of David Quinn, of Chicago, Illinois, for reestablishment of slavery.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Rush, Jo Daviess county, Illinois, asking that no act be passed curtailing the national currency, or compelling all national banks, wherever located, to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By Mr. INGERSOLL: The memorial and other papers on file in the case of Robert T. Winslow, for compensation for services in raising a regiment of infantry, were withdrawn from the file of the House, and recommended to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 9, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM PATON, D. D., New Haven, Connecticut.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented two petitions of citizens of Vermont, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of merchants of Wilmington, North Carolina, praying for a change in the internal revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented thirty-two petitions from citizens of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and Wisconsin, praying for the imposition of an increased duty on flaxseed; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Erie county, Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a memorial of citizens of Johnson county, Missouri, praying that Congress will not provide for any further curtailment of the national currency; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present a memorial of merchants of the city of St. Paul, Minnesota, protesting against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or having in view the return, within a limited time, to specie payments. They respectfully represent that the further reduction of the volume of currency at present would prove highly injurious to the banking, manufacturing, and mercantile interests of the country, and would entail suffering upon nearly every member of the community; and they express the opinion that if such currency shall now be contracted we are near the time when the lawful obligations of citizens cannot be met. They also ask Congress to refrain from the enactment of any law compelling all national banks, where ever located, to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting national banks from paying or receiving interest on bank balances. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Berkshire county, Massachusetts, interested in woolen manufactures, praying for relief under the existing tariff; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of loyal citizens of Norfolk, Portsmouth, and adjoining counties of eastern Virginia, without distinction of color, in which they ask Congress to remove the anti-republican form of government now existing in Virginia, which deprives them of exercising the right of the elective franchise and all other rights guaranteed to them as citizens. I understand that this petition, which is signed by a respectable number of names, is the forerunner of a much larger petition from the same community and for the same purpose. I move its reference to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the remonstrance of Rev. George H. Washington, and two hundred and seventy-five other colored citizens of Boston, against the admission of Nebraska as a State with a constitution which disfranchises citizens on account of color. In this petition the signers dwell particularly on the dangerous character of such an admission as an entering wedge to that of the rebel States. I also offer a similar remonstrance from Lieutenant Charles L. Mitchell, late of the fifty-fifth regiment of Massachusetts volunteers, and now a representative in the Massachusetts General Court, a colored citizen, with other colored citizens of Boston. As this subject is now before the Senate I move that these remonstrances lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of the New England Emigrant Aid Company, a corporation under the laws of Massachusetts, in which they ask indemnification for property of theirs to the amount of $25,000 unlawfully destroyed at Lawrence, in the Territory of Kansas, by a mob acting under the direction of one Samuel Jones and in the presence of one Donaldson, said Jones and Donaldson being there respectively as deputy marshal and marshal of the United States for that Territory, and the said Jones being also a territorial sheriff, and declaring said mob to be their official posse, the same being also declared by the then territorial Governor, Wilson Shannon, his protection having been invoked against the unlawful violence threatened by said mob, and having been refused by him on the ground that it was the legally constituted posse of the United States marshal and sheriff of Douglas county. This case was before the Senate some years ago, but to the best of my knowledge there was never any action upon it. It is a historic case. The parties interested in it at the time were generous and patriotic; they lost what they could not afford to lose, and they now wish to have it returned. They have asked me to request the Senate to have their memorial printed for its better consideration. I therefore, in presenting it and moving its reference to the Committee on Claims, move that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. Does not the motion to print necessarily go to the Committee on Printing?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does unless by unanimous consent that rule be dispensed with.

Mr. GRIMES. I insist on the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Claims, and the motion to print to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 388) to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of William Blake, a soldier in the war of 1812, praying to be allowed back pension from the date of his discharge from the service, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Henry M. Buell, praying to be allowed a land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land for services rendered to the Government during the late rebellion, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 465) for the relief of Mary Stanley, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 206) in relation to the pensions of widows of revolutionary soldiers, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the city of Washington," approved May 17, 1848, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 15) to repeal certain laws and ordinances in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 872) supplemental to an act relating to the admission of patients to the Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia, approved January 28, 1864, reported adversely thereon, the subject having been already acted on by the Senate in a bill from the House of Representatives, and moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which was agreed to.

WIDOWS OF TENNESSEE SOLDIERS.

Mr. LANE. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 454) for the relief of the widow of Jacob Harmon, the bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of the widow of Henry Fry, and the bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, deceased, to report them back without amendment, and to ask that they may now be put on their passage. These are bills that will excite no debate and no opposition. They have been examined by the committee, and the facts are sufficiently clear and are known to a Senator on this floor.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 454) for the relief of the widow of Jacob Harmon. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Jacob Harmon, of Greene county, Tennessee, on the pension-roll at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 16th of December, 1861, and to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. LANE. These three bills all depend upon the same statement of facts, and I will state in a few words what they all are. In 1861 these three soldiers of East Tennessee were mustered into service. They were ordered by their commanding officer to burn a bridge. They were captured, after having burned the bridge, and hung up without trial and murdered in the streets of Knoxville and Greenville. We propose now to put their widows on the pension-roll by special act, simply because their muster-in and all the papers were destroyed when their commanding officer was captured. That is the whole case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of the widow of Henry Fry. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Henry Fry, of Greene county, Tennessee, on the pension-roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 27th of December, 1861, and to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, deceased. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place the names of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, of Greene county, Tennessee, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, deceased, on the pension-roll at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 27th of December, 1861.

Mr. LANE. I move to amend that bill so as to provide that this pension shall continue until the children arrive at the age of sixteen. The general law provides for it, but I think it is better, perhaps, in a special law like this to insert it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being interposed, the bill will be so amended, by adding "this pension to continue until they severally attain the age of sixteen years."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 69, which was under consideration during the morning hour yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Howe to the first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the House amendment, by striking out the word "October" and inserting "July."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the impression of the Chair, the Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor on this bill, his remarks having been cut short on the expiration of the morning hour yesterday.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I had almost completed what I desired to say upon the bill. I intended only to add that I have no objection to that part of the bill which requires the appointment of pension agents to be made by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate. Perhaps these officers have become of such importance as justifies this, although I know nothing in regard to the public service and the disbursement of public money by those agents that seems to make it necessary thus to legislate. I am not aware of any defaults on the part of pension agents under their present appointments. Therefore I do not vote for that feature of the bill from any distrust of the agents already appointed, or because of any failure on their part properly to account for the moneys in their hands. But I think the Senate ought to consider a little before the limitation is agreed to of three agents only in a State, and I wish the attention of my colleague on that subject for a moment, as it is of importance to our citizens.

Of course I cannot judge of the condition of other States upon this question; but I think in Indiana we ought to have more than three pension agents, and as it is a matter of convenience to the pensioners to have the agencies near to them so as to avoid the expense of travel or the expense of employing private agents to attend to their business, that they may go in person to the public agencies and transact their business, I think that in the State of Indiana we ought to have at least five agencies, one for the northeastern, one for the central, one for the southern, one for the extreme southwestern portion at Evansville, and one for the northern part of the State. I cannot think that my colleague will differ with me upon that subject. I think it will be unfortunate if we restrict the number to three, especially as the interests of the Treasury do not require it. I understood from my colleague, as I had also before understood the law to be, that whether there be three or five agents in a State makes but little difference to the Treasury, inasmuch as the agents are paid a commission. The fact that there is a maximum fixed will create a little difference in favor of the small number, but that is so inconsiderable as to make no consideration as against the convenience of the pensioners themselves. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin I have no objection to if the Senate is willing to go into this kind of legislation. I suppose he wishes to strike some particular officer who happened to be appointed by the present Administration prior to the month of October. If the Senate considers that of such importance as to make the amendment, I have no objection to it of course.

Mr. HOWE. I beg leave to say, for the satisfaction of my friend from Indiana that the object is rather to save friends appointed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. To save them! I am not able to see exactly how this proposition will save anybody. I understand the amendment to be to strike out October and insert July of 1866—to go back a few months; in other words, to legislate all agents out of office who were appointed between July and October. That is his proposition. I think, sir, that we ought just to say in general terms that agents to be appointed hereafter shall be confirmed by the Senate treat these officers just as Congress has always been in the habit of treating the public officers, and not descend to the business of legislating one set of men out of office to put another set of men in.

Mr. LANE. In reference to the number of agencies in particular States, I will say that as the bill was reported by myself at the last session from the Committee on Pensions, and as it passed the Senate, there was no limit as to the number. I thought at that time it was improper to limit the number, although the Secretary of the Interior thought three agencies quite enough for any one State; but the limitation as to the number of agents to be appointed in a State has been put on in the House of Representatives.

If the matter were left to myself, I would prefer no limitation as to the number, but to leave it to the discretion of the President to appoint one wherever he supposed it might be necessary. I do know that in my State four agencies would be much more convenient to the people than three, the number contemplated by this bill. The increased expense would be something, to be sure, because, in addition to the commissions which pension agents are allowed, there must be added the expense of office rent and clerk hire; that would be the only additional expense for an additional agent. I should have preferred no limitation as to number, but the limitation was put on in the House of Representatives.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to the amendment, I regret that my colleague has thought proper to introduce it, or at all events to give the reason for the amendment which he has just avowed. There are but two pension agents, I believe, in Wisconsin; one is Colonel Reynolds, located at Madison, and the other is Colonel Fitch, at Milwaukee. Why there should be a disposition to make an amendment that might affect one and not affect the other I certainly am at a loss to know. I do not see the reason why one should be stricken at and the other not. Both were appointed by Mr. Harlan, the late Secretary of the Interior, I believe.

Mr. HOWE. I have only to say that the amendment I have moved does not strike anybody in Wisconsin. It is a saving measure, not a destroying measure; it saves all alike.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood my colleague to state that it was to save a pension agent—to save his being sent into the Senate for confirmation. That is the only saving there is about it. I do not know why one should be saved and the other not.

The question being taken on Mr. Howe's amendment to the amendment of the committee, there were—14 ayes, and 7 noes; no quorum voting.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear a statement of what the amendment is. I do not know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The division discloses the fact that no quorum is present; business cannot proceed until it is ascertained that there is a quorum.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. LANE. I move a call of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is never a call of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think there is a quorum present if Senators will vote.

The yeas and nays having been called, were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have a statement of what the question is. I do not understand it, and that was the reason I did not vote. I did not know what the question before the Senate was.

The proposed amendment was read.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Judiciary Committee reported for the month of October.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Eighteen hundred and sixty-five or 1866?

Mr. HOWE. Eighteen hundred and sixty-five. I want July, 1866.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand the reason of my colleague's amendment. He says he proposes to go back to July for the purpose of saving somebody. I only referred to my own State; I know there are but two agents there, both colonels who served in the Army; both appointed under Mr. Harlan when Secretary of the Interior. I do not know any reason for applying this law to one and not to the other. If one must come in and be confirmed by the Senate, I think it fair that the other should also. I have no particular feeling about the question; but it seems to me that if one pension agent is to be confirmed by the Senate all ought to be confirmed by the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESSENDEN, (when his name was called.) I wish to state, if I may be allowed to do so, that I desire to fix a later day; but the call began so quick that it was impossible for me to make a suggestion to my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe.] The call of the roll having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 16, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Wiley, and Williams—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, and Van Winkle—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cattell, Davis, Fogg, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Harris, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—19.

So the amendment of Mr. Howe was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow. I wish to look at it. I do not know that I have any objection to it; but I should like time to look at it further.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. With the consent of the Senate, I send to the Chair an amendment to that bill, which I should like to have printed, so that it may be before us to-morrow.

The proposed amendment was received informally and ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has not fully expired, but as no motion is made, the Chair will call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union, the question pending being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN.] Upon this question the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I stated yesterday, I rise with no view to discuss the merits of the measure itself to which the proposition upon the table is offered as an amendment. My opinion upon that measure and the reason on which it rests was stated to the Senate when the subject was under discussion at an earlier day of the session. I rise merely to discuss the question which as I suppose the particular amendment now before the Senate presents. The honorable member who proposed it [Mr. EDMUNDS] has stated the ground upon which he thinks we have the authority to adopt it. As in my view that ground is not only wholly untenable, but is positively mischievous, I desire as well as I may be able to state the considerations which lead me to that conclusion.

The ground taken by the honorable member from Vermont is this: as Nebraska is now a Territory and subject to the jurisdiction of Congress, either under the clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the authority to pass rules and regulations in relation to the disposal of the public property, or because of the implied power that the possession of a Territory involves necessarily the right to govern it, he maintains that we are at liberty to keep the Territory in the condition in which it now is, and govern it at all times hereafter as long as we may think proper so to govern it as a Territory; and, being under no obligation to admit it as a State, we are at liberty, if we are asked to admit it, to impose any condition upon that admission which we may think proper.

The error of that doctrine consists, I think, in not understanding correctly the purpose of the clause in the Constitution which gives to Congress the authority to admit new States. It has never that I am aware of been maintained until now, if it is now maintained by my friend from Vermont, that under that authority Congress has any right to form a constitution for the people of a Territory who may desire to come in as a State; and if he be in error, it consists in confounding two things that, in my judgment, are clearly distinct. The power which we have is to admit new States, that is all, and the extent of that power which is implied in the authority to admit is to be ascertained by recurring to the subject to which it is made applicable, to the thing which is to occur if the power is exerted. The subject to which the term applies in express language is a State, not in the general acceptance of the term, not in the sense in which that term may be understood elsewhere than in the United States, not in the sense in which it may be understood geographically, but in the sense in which, when admitted, it is to become one of the States of the United States; and one would suppose, when the authority is to admit a State into the existing Union of States, that the sole purpose of the Constitution was to give to Congress the authority to bring into the Union a State not within it before, but partaking precisely of all the characteristics and possessing all the powers and having all the rights that characterize and are possessed by the States that were in the Union when the Constitution was ratified.

The question then is, what is a State admitted after the ratification of the States by the original thirteen? What must it be? It is a State required only, so far as the Constitution prescribes anything in relation to its character, to be republican in point of form. That form being possessed, then the only other qualification, if qualification it can be called, is that it is in all respects to possess all the powers and all the rights that belong to the original States. If it was otherwise we should have composing the States of the Union gross inequalities; some States would possess rights, political rights and civil rights, that would not be possessed by other States. Instead of constituting a harmonious whole there would be anything but harmony, so far as harmony is to be conferred or is to result from the unity of the States each with the other.

But there is another reason which I submit to my friend from Vermont. If he is right, it would follow that the amendment to the Constitution which received the unanimous sanction of the people of the several original States would be practically of no importance to the new States: I mean the amendment, without the anticipated adoption of which we have every reason to believe the Constitution never would have been ratified, which says that all powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the States or the people of the States. Now, I suppose it will hardly be denied that every State in the Union, irrespective of the time when she becomes a State of the Union, is equally entitled to the protection which that amendment was intended to confer upon the States. I suppose that the State of Vermont, for example, although I believe not a State in the Union when that amendment was adopted, has now all the rights as a State, and her citizens have all the rights as citizens under that clause, that Maryland and her citizens have under the same clause. I am sure the honorable member from Vermont will not be heard to contest that.

If, then, the reservation clause applies to the new States as well as to the original thirteen, the question is, what were the rights delegated to the Government of the United States; or, to make myself more easily understood, what were the powers conferred upon the Congress of the United States of a legislative character by the Constitution? The moment we ascertain the extent of those powers, as no other department of the Government is clothed with any legislative power, we ascertain the extent of the reservation clause to be found in the amendment; and we therefore necessarily reach the conclusion that if Congress has not the particular power which may be disputed in any instance, it is because it is not delegated; and we come necessarily to the conclusion that because it is not delegated it belongs to the States as contradistinguished from the Congress.

Then, Mr. President, in the logical arrangement of the argument, which nobody better comprehends than my friend from Vermont—his mind and his profession have made him strictly logical—the next question that arises is, is the right which this amendment deals with a right delegated to Congress? for, as I have said, if it is not, it is a right possessed by the States; and if Nebraska, when she comes into the Union, will be entitled to the whole extent of the authority reserved under the amendment, then Nebraska will be made to surrender, if she can do it, or rather we attempt to force upon her a surrender of a right which the reserved clause secures to her.

Then, Mr. President, has Congress any authority over the subject to which the amendment applies? I have not as yet heard any argument, I was about to say any plausible ground, upon which such a proposition has been maintained. I do not know that it has been maintained at all, except I believe by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] and that only because the regulation of the suffrage is material in order to the proper discharge of the obligation to guaranty a republican form of government, and secondly, because that regulation is involved impliedly, if not express-edly, in one of the resolutions accompanying the amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery. I do not propose to discuss the question now. I assume that over the right of suffrage in the States Congress has no power. I say I decline to discuss it, and will content myself with stating very briefly the simple grounds upon which, as I think, that proposition rests.

In the first place, there is nothing in the Constitution which in terms gives to Congress any such power. In the second place, the clause which confers upon Congress all its powers confers only such as are there delegated. In the third place, the only provision in the Constitution which relates to elections at all relates exclusively to the election of members of Congress and of Senators of the several States, and in relation to the first the provision is that they are to be elected by the people of the several States who are by the laws of the several States or the constitutions of the several States to be the constituents of the members of their House of Delegates, or their popular assembly, whatever that may be called. So there is not only the absence of any express authority to interfere with the right of suffrage in the States, but there is a clear implication of the absence of any such purpose by incorporating into the Constitution a provision that the electors of the members of Congress are to have the qualifications required for the electors of the popular branch of each State Legislature; and nobody has ever pretended that Congress can prescribe the qualifications of the voters in State elections for State officers.

But my friend from Vermont says—and he will pardon me for saying that as I view it his proposition is entirely novel, not sanctioned by the precedents to which he has adverted when they come to be distinctly understood—that as we have the authority to admit, and are not compelled to admit, we may, with the assent of the State which is to be admitted, prescribe just such conditions as we think proper. Where does that lead us? If I am right in saying that over the question of suffrage Congress has no power, it is because over that question the States have the exclusive power; it is because the Constitution of the United States never intended to interfere with that power at all as it was originally framed; and because the people of the United States recently, after the adoption of the Constitution by a sufficient number of States and the organization of the Government, passed the amendment to which I have referred, expressly leaving with the States, as a right, everything which was not delegated by the Constitution of the United States to the General Government.

But it is said you may impose a condition. Let us see where that will lead us logically, or, to use the language of the books, what is the logical sequence of that proposition? Any condition may be made a fundamental condition of the admission of the State, irrespective of the inquiry whether the subject to which the condition refers is one over which the States were intended to have exclusive authority, and consequently irrespective of the question as to what the nature of that condition may be in its operation upon the power of the State. This amendment deals with suffrage; but the States have the same authority over the question of suffrage that they have over every subject submitted to their jurisdiction by the Constitution, or reserved for their jurisdiction by the Constitution, not parted with by themselves, over the laws of contract of every description, the laws of marriage, the laws of divorce, the manner in which conveyances of real estate are to be executed and acknowledged, the civil and the criminal code. Every particular to which the power of the States was supposed to extend may be, if the honorable member is right, taken away as regards new States by attaching to the act for their admission into the Union a fundamental condition that such rights are not thereafter to be exercised.

But it is not only true in relation to all the rights which belong to the States, because not transferred to the United States; it is equally true of the particular right conferred upon a State by the Constitution itself. Every State is to have two Senators upon this floor. That right is no more secured to a State than is the right to legislate exclusively upon the subjects to which I have alluded. They stand precisely upon the same ground—the authority of the Constitution; in the one case because of the reservation of the power to the States; in the other case because of the express delegation of the particular power to the people of the State of being represented upon this floor. Now, will my honorable friend assert that we could in the act for the admission of Nebraska say that it is to be considered as a fundamental condition of the act admitting her that at no time shall Nebraska have more than one Senator or have any Senator?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not say that we could make such a provision as that, because the Constitution of the United States expressly declares that no State without her consent shall be deprived of her equal representation in the Senate. That is a subject, therefore, in respect to which we are bound by the Constitution. It does not say when it gives that equality that we may not declare that there shall be no slavery in the new State, and that we may not declare that there shall be equal suffrage in the State.

Mr. JOHNSON. That, if my friend will pardon me for saying it, is altogether an unsatisfactory answer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no doubt it is to my friend from Maryland.

Mr. JOHNSON. I mean unsatisfactory logically, not to me individually. It is nothing to me more than it is to the honorable member.

If I am right in saying that there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which interferes with the power of the State to regulate its suffrage, and if I am right in saying that the reserved clause to be found in the amendment places the States over that subject in the condition in which they were before the Constitution was adopted, then it follows that they have precisely the same right over the question of suffrage that they have over the question as to their right to be represented in the Senate by two Senators. But the Senator says that he would not for a moment contend that a State could be deprived of her right to be represented upon this floor by two Senators, because the Constitution provides against that by saying that such a power shall not be exerted without the consent of the State. What has been his argument; what has been the argument before in support of the proposition which is now before us? That the State, if she comes in after we have adopted his amendment, is considered as assenting. If she can consent to divest herself of every other right which she possesses under the Constitution except the right to be represented by two Senators, why cannot she assent to divest herself of that right?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me, the reason is this: my proposition was, not that the State, as a State, after being created, assents to these fundamental conditions which we impose, but that the people, who ask us to give them this charter of liberty to work upon, in the very act of adopting that charter and proceeding to work upon it, assent to the foundations which we have laid down. But the idea of my friend from Maryland presupposes that there must be a State to assent to this dismemberment of her senatorial representation when she must have assented to that proposition in the act of becoming a State; and my friend will see there is in point of law a distinction between the two propositions.

Mr. JOHNSON. There may be; but I am unable to see it. I had thought that the honorable member considered that the State of Nebraska would be bound, if she came in, because of an implied assent on her part. That was the ground taken by some of the friends of the proposition; and that is the ground, let me say to the honorable member, upon which all the conditions heretofore imposed upon the States which have been admitted have been placed in the past. Now, what are they? In some of them the condition has been that the navigable waters within their limits shall be free. Under what authority was that imposed upon the State? Under the authority which the Constitution gives to the Congress of the United States to regulate commerce. That authority, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, as the honorable member knows very well, was, by the unanimous decision of that high tribunal, the Supreme Court of the United States, decided to include the navigable waters, the vehicle upon which as well as in which commerce was to be carried on; and therefore that condition which, in some of the instances has been applied to the admission of some of the States, was to reserve, in order to avoid any possible conflict, that which was the right, and was intended to be the right, of Congress exclusively to regulate the commerce between the States and the commerce between foreign nations and the United States.

What are the other classes? There is another class which says that the public lands which may be within the limits of the State admitted shall not be liable to taxation. Upon what ground was that placed or might it have been placed? In almost the beginning of the Government, in the case of New Jersey vs. Wilson, reported in 7 Cranch, I think the court decided that it was competent for a State to enter into a contract to exempt from State taxation, for a valuable consideration, any of her lands. The State of New Jersey, being anxious to get possession of a considerable quantity of land that belonged to the Indians, made a treaty in the form of a law, which provided that if the Indians would agree to sell the lands which New Jersey desired they might buy other lands in that State, and that those lands should forever thereafter be exempt from taxation. They were not authorized to sell the lands, however, under the original act, which I have called a treaty. In 1804 New Jersey passed an act authorizing them to sell the land, but omitted to say anything in relation to taxation; and the question arose when the State of New Jersey attempted to exert her taxing power upon the lands in the hands of purchasers under the Indians. The Supreme Court decided that it could not be done; that the contract was one which followed the lands, no matter who might thereafter become the holder.

The Supreme Court at the present term has decided a case upon the same ground; a case which I argued in behalf of the holders of the land involved in that case. The United States granted to Arkansas all the swamp lands which were owned by the United States within the limits of Arkansas. As swamp lands they were valueless; they could only become valuable by being converted into tillable lands; and the State of Arkansas, with a view to bring about that conversion, passed an act authorizing any persons who would undertake the work to do it to be paid out of the treasury the value of the work, if they thought proper to be paid; to be paid in the bonds of the State if they preferred that mode of being paid; or to take certificates which would entitle the holder, the certificates being upon their face transferable, to locate the amount called for in his certificate upon these lands, and that they thereafter should be exempt from taxation. The work was undertaken. A great many of the parties who performed the work chose to take certificates, and they located their certificates upon these recovered lands, and as soon as they became valuable Arkansas thought proper to tax them. The Supreme Court have decided here at this term, against the unanimous decision of the court of the State of Arkansas, that she could do no such thing; that the exemption from taxation was a consideration moving from the man who performed the work and accompanied the land in the hands of whoever might become the proprietor of the land during the period for which the exemption was provided.

That is upon this ground, and upon this ground only, that a State is competent to divest herself, for a valuable consideration of her taxing power in particular cases; and that is all that she does when she comes in upon a condition that she is not to tax the land of the United States. As a State, when she came in she would have a perfect right to say to the United States in the form of a contract, "We will not tax your land;" and as she would have a right after coming in to enter into a contract of that description, there was nothing inconsistent with any sovereignty of her own in providing in advance, in the form of a condition to which she assents in coming in, that she will not exercise that particular right; but this is a slightly different question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But taxation is a sovereign power.

Mr. JOHNSON. A right, too. She had a right to tax. She is to judge herself whether she will execute the power; but the power necessarily involves the support of the State. The State government must be supported, and the only mode of supporting it is through some form of taxation. It was contended in the two cases to which I have referred that the State could not part with the taxing power. The answer which the Supreme Court gave, and the answer was satisfactory to the whole bench on each occasion, was, that the State could enter into a contract in relation to any subject which did not impair her sovereignty and take away her ability to hold an equal place among her sister States; and as she could do it in relation to the two subjects to which I have adverted after she came in, she could do it the moment of coming in.

But my friend says they are not States. In one sense they are not States. That very amendment, however, deals with Nebraska as a State now. She is not in now. The bill upon your table deals with her, of course, as a State now. In the amendment and in the bill itself she is spoken of as a State, and yet she is not in. She is a State, having no control, however, over Congress, having no right to interfere with the authority which Congress is exerting through its power to regulate the public Territories of the United States; but she is a State in the sense of the clause which gives to Congress the power to admit her; because, I was about to say, it is an absurdity to suppose that Congress can admit as a State that which is not a State; at least I think so. Here is Nebraska. She says she is a State of the Union; a State that should be admitted into the Union. She has formed her constitution either under the authority of your enabling act, or she has formed it upon the authority which is implied from what has occurred over and over again in the admission of new States; that is to say, the authority to form a constitution without an antecedent enabling act. She has elected her Senators. Now my friend proposes to admit Nebraska. What will he do the moment Congress passes the bill for the admission of Nebraska? Will he make any objection to the swearing in of the two Senators who have been elected? I am sure he will not; but yet they have not been elected, if he is right, by any State, and Senators can only be elected by a State. He persists in telling us—and of course he is sincere in that opinion—that they have been elected by a mere concourse of citizens who have no political power whatever, but are entirely subject to the territorial laws which they have passed under the authority of Congress, and which alone they were justified in passing; and in the laws which Congress have passed for the government of the Territory they have given to them no power to elect Senators. Now—

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will allow me on this subject of the nature of the precedent action, which I contend, as he says, is irregular, I desire to refer him to the opinions of the Attorneys General on this very subject, in which they have advised the Administration, whenever they have been called upon to give advice, that—

"The territorial Legislatures cannot, without permission from Congress, pass laws authorizing the formation of constitutions and State governments. All measures commenced and prosecuted with a design to subvert the territorial government, and to establish and put in force in its place a new government, without the consent of Congress, are unlawful. But the people of any Territory may peaceably meet together in primary assemblies, or in conventions chosen by such assemblies, for the purpose of petitioning Congress to abrogate the territorial government, and to admit them into the Union as an independent State; and if they accompany their petition with a constitution framed and agreed on by their primary assemblies, or by a convention of delegates chosen by such assemblies, there is no objection to their power to do so, nor to any measures which may be taken to collect the sense of the people in respect to it; provided such measures be prosecuted in a peaceable manner, in subordination to the existing Government, and in subserviency to the power of Congress to adopt, reject, or disregard them at their pleasure."

That is to be found in the second volume of the Opinions of the Attorneys General. My proposition therefore is, that although all this preceding action is irregular and without any sanction of law, yet, like any other act which the law-making power having supreme administration of the subject sanctions, when it receives the sanction of law, the law does in a certain sense retroact and make that valid which before the action of the law had no validity at all. My friend will pardon me for interrupting him, as I do not wish to speak after he is through.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly. I am perfectly aware of that opinion, and one or two others to the same effect. That does not interfere with the view which I am endeavoring to present to the Senate, and particularly to the honorable member. Nobody has ever questioned that the people of a Territory have no right, strictly speaking, to form themselves into a State government and get clear of the obligation that they are under to the Government of the United States because of the territorial government which the United States have provided for them without the consent of Congress; but, as we all know, and as that opinion admits, from time to time the people of the Territories have, not casting off their territorial allegiance, their allegiance to the United States as the citizens of a Territory, formed governments for themselves, and they have been admitted. Now the honorable member gets clear of the difficulty which I suggested in answer to his objection that this was not a State, by saying that when we pass the law it retroacts. That is an extraordinary power on the part of Congress. The power in Congress is to admit; that is all; admit an existing State. Nobody has ever pretended that Congress has any authority to constitute a State. As was said by the honorable member from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] before the recess, Congress has no authority, nor has the Government of the United States in all its departments any authority to form a State constitution or to create a State. That must be the work of the citizens; and if the citizens, either with or without an enabling act, form a State government and Congress admit that State government, they, by the very act of admission, concede that that is a State at the moment of admission, which should be one of the States of the Union, not a crippled member of the Union, but one possessing all the powers possessed by any other of the States of the Union.

I have therefore, Mr. President, been unable to agree to this amendment, because, as I think, Congress has no authority, with or without the assent of a State, to impose any such condition. The right of equal power is a right not intended only to be given and therefore to be disposed of by the people of the State for the time being who may be there when they are admitted into the Union as a State, but it is to follow them and their descendants to the last generation as long as the Government endures. The doctrine which maintains that we have the authority to impose conditions deals with the subject as if the people for the time being were alone concerned in having their State possess equal powers with the rest of the States; but that is not the theory of the Constitution. There are some other rights which are inalienable; the Declaration of Independence says life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; but that is relied upon for a different purpose. There are other rights, political in their character, which are also inalienable as long as our Government endures, and those rights are the political rights secured to States in order to enable them to be the equals of all their sisters, and to bring to the preservation of the Government through all time precisely an equal amount of authority which may be possessed politically by any other member of the Union. In other words, Mr. President, and to conclude, we were intended to be equal as States—equal individually as men. Equality is impressed by the Constitution upon both characters—upon the political character of the citizens composing a State, and upon their individual character as citizens. No distinction was designed to be created. It was the purpose of the Constitution to place all upon the high, elevated ground of equality of political and individual rights; and that being the case, in my judgment, it necessarily follows that the amendment upon the table cannot be constitutionally supported.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I had intended yesterday, had I been recognized by the Chair, to say something in reply to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE;] but the occasion passed, and I have no desire to-day to recall that controversy. I shall content myself, therefore, with one word to explain the vote which I propose to give.

I prefer the amendment moved by the Senator from Missouri; but if that be voted down I shall gladly accept the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont. I prefer that moved by the Senator from Missouri, because it is in conformity with fixed precedents in the Congress of the United States. It places the equality of all men before the law under the protection of a compact between the United States on the one part and the State on the other part. It therefore has not only the validity of legislation, but the further supremacy, if I may so express myself, of Compact. On this point I desire to call attention to the language which was once uttered in this Chamber by Mr. Webster; and indeed I doubt if in all his utterances he ever expressed himself with more power and felicity. I believe on another occasion I called the attention of the Senate to this same passage; but it will bear repetition. Alluding to the ordinance for the Northwest Territory, by which slavery was forever prohibited there, Mr. Webster uses the following language:

"It fixed forever the character of the population in the vast regions northwest of the Ohio by excluding from them involuntary servitude. It impressed on the soil itself, while it was yet a wilderness, an incapacity to bear up any other than freemen. It laid the interdiction against personal servitude, in original compact, not only deeper than all local law, but deeper also than all local constitutions."

Those are the words of Mr. Webster, and they are strictly applicable to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, should it be adopted by Congress and become a part of the statute admitting Nebraska into the Union. It is therefore on account of its positive, recognized efficacy, according to the approved precedents of our history, that I prefer that amendment.

But, sir, should the Senate not agree with me, should it be voted down, then I shall take the next best thing; I shall take the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. I shall try to regard that also as in the nature of a compact, but not of so positive and express character as the other form of the proposition. But whatever may be its validity, the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, if adopted, will have at least this efficacy: it will keep the Congress of the United States on the record clear and above reproach; it will save the nation from being stultified by an act of Congress which, as it now stands, is in absolute defiance of the first principles of the Declaration of Independence. It is, therefore, because it will have the effect of bringing the statute at last into harmony with the Declaration of Independence that I shall vote for it. I accept it reluctantly as a settlement of this question, but I am willing to accept it. Preferring, however, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, I shall be obliged to vote against the proposition of the Senator from Vermont if it is moved as a substitute for that. I had hoped that he would not antagonize his proposition with that of the Senator from Missouri, but that he would allow us to vote on each separately. I now think that would be the best form of proceeding; but if the Senator perseveres in antagonizing his proposition with the other, I shall be obliged, at the first stage, to vote against it.

Mr. WADE. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri, of course, defeats the great object of the bill, because it requires the people throughout this vast Territory to assemble together and hold another election. That is equivalent, in my judgment, to a total rejection of the constitution and a defeat of the very purpose I had in view in urging the bill now. That amendment will put the people to the trouble and expense of another election, and put the whole matter at large again. So nothing will be gained by fastening this amendment on the bill. Therefore I take it that the friends of this bill who think it is best that the State of Nebraska should be admitted at once will vote against that amendment.

As to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, I find that there is some disagreement in regard to the law and Constitution on the subject; but the amendment is certainly a very harmless one, and it lies in the direction that we almost all approve. I want such a provision affixed in this case as much as the Senator from Massachusetts, if it can be done; and that will not prevent the immediate admission of the State. I hope, therefore, the friends of the bill who think that amendment is right and proper will vote for it, as I shall myself.

I make these observations only because I desire it may be perfectly understood what we are doing. If you adopt the amendment of the Senator from Missouri you defeat the immediate purpose of the bill, and send the people back to take the whole subject under consideration again, really defeating the measure. If you adopt the amendment of the Senator from Vermont you simply conform to the opinions of those who are in favor of universal suffrage. I believe that is calculated and designed to harmonize all the friends of that principle. I hope, therefore, the Senate will reject the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, and adopt that of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, now I want to add a word. I want to say that if we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, we impose upon no inhabitant of Nebraska any other sacrifice in the world than that of attending an election, which at the most will occupy one day of his time. No man who lives in Nebraska will have to attend to an election that costs him any more time than that, and the vast majority of them can attend the election without spending an hour; and the question is whether this matter of suffrage or no suffrage for colored men in Nebraska is of sufficient importance, is of sufficient moment, to ask that amount of sacrifice of the different citizens of Nebraska. That is all there is of that; and if you adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, and the people of Nebraska acquiesce in it, then that will be the law of Nebraska, and you know it, and no man denies it; but, if on the other hand, you adopt in lieu of that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont it will not be the law of Nebraska, and the Senator from Vermont admits that it will not be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not admit anything of the kind. I say, on the contrary, that it will be the law of Nebraska, just as every other act of Congress regularly passed is the law over the people of every State in the Union.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not understand that we pass a law if we adopt the Senator's amendment declaring that colored men shall have the right of suffrage in Nebraska, but we simply say that Nebraska may come into the Union as a State if she will allow colored men to vote in that State. But I did understand him to say, and I have his remarks before me now, I have looked them over, and I do still understand him to have said yesterday in reply to the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] that the colored suffrage would not be decreed in Nebraska if we adopted his amendment; that it would still be optional with the State of Nebraska to give them suffrage or to withhold suffrage from them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend read the remarks?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir, I will:

"As I have said before in the course of this debate, the people of any State, whatever may be the limitations in their government, whether as to slavery or anything else, may choose to become dissolved and not to exercise the political functions with which they are endowed, whether they are old or new; and when they cease to exercise those functions, to hold elections, to send Senators and Representatives, and to exercise the other acts which are necessary in political communities, of course, as an organized political community, that State becomes dissolved, and there is no power in the Government at all, because in the nature of things there cannot be, to compel those people to exercise those functions."

"Now, if we admit this State with this fundamental condition, which becomes a part of the act of admission, then any action which her agents and representatives may take under it is prima facie evidence that they are exercising political power under the charter of incorporation which we have chosen to grant them. If it turns out afterward that the agents who have thus assumed to represent the State and to exercise those functions with which we have invested them are repudiated by their people, their stockholders, to use an apt illustration, and the stockholders choose to dissolve the corporation, then of course the representative functions of those agents must cease, and we shall only be in the condition that we often are for a short time of having had representatives in this body who, it finally turned out, had no right to be here."

If I understand that, it means simply this: that if we accept the State upon this fundamental condition there is yet reserved to Nebraska—I do not understand whether to the people or the Legislature or the Governor or the courts of Nebraska—but to Nebraska in some shape there is yet reserved the power to say, notwithstanding, we have taken her representatives in here, whether she consents to that condition or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to say to my friend, that if we admit Nebraska without this condition at all, if we pass the bill just as it is, precisely the power that I was speaking of yesterday is reserved to her still because we cannot enforce the specific performance of political duties. That is all there is of that.

Mr. HOWE. The question is, if by adopting this amendment we make it a part of the organic law of Nebraska that colored men shall vote; or rather, if we make it a law which supersedes, which is paramount to the organic law of Nebraska that colored men shall vote, colored men can then vote, whether we take in the representatives of Nebraska here or not. What I want to know is, will it be the law of Nebraska, in spite of anything that she may say herself, that colored men can vote?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say it will be the law of Nebraska, provided she exists as a State at all, irrespective of her State will.

Mr. HOWE. If we put this amendment upon the pending bill and then pass the bill, two things will certainly happen: first, that two men will come upon this floor to represent Nebraska in making laws for the United States, and one will come upon the floor of the other House to perform the same functions. That is one thing which will happen certainly. Another thing is that there is a Governor elected for the State of Nebraska, a Legislature and courts provided, and they will take upon themselves the functions of that State, and there will be these two machines in full motion certainly. But will colored men vote in Nebraska or not?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They will.

Mr. HOWE. They will—sure?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Sure.

Mr. HOWE. Then what was the meaning of the Senator when he said they may choose to dissolve themselves?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is because in the case supposed they do not choose to dissolve themselves, but choose to go on.

Mr. HOWE. But who choose to go on? A couple of gentlemen choose to take seats here and draw their salaries and their mileage, and another gentleman chooses to take his seat in the House of Representatives and draw his salary and mileage. That is what they choose; but they were not selected by the State of Nebraska or the people of the State of Nebraska for the purpose of committing her on this question of accepting or rejecting the proposition of colored suffrage. There is a Governor chosen in Nebraska, and he may choose for himself to take upon himself the functions of Governor. But do these acts commit the people of Nebraska to the law of negro suffrage?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They commit the people of Nebraska just as long as they choose to submit to that Governor and to that representation. If they do not choose to submit to that Governor and to that representation, and do not continue that organization on the ground that it has exceeded its powers, or on any other ground that seems to be suitable to the people, then there will not be any State government there. The Governor derives his power to act at all from the act of Congress which gives the State vitality; and if he does act, we must take it, as long as he acts by the sufferance of the people, that there is a State government in Nebraska. If he does not choose to act, or the people do not choose to permit him to act, then there will not be any such organized government in Nebraska.

Mr. HOWE. Now, Mr. President, let us look at it. So long as he acts by the sufferance of the people of Nebraska we are to understand that the people of Nebraska assent to colored suffrage. But he does not act a day by the sufferance of the people of Nebraska, simply because the people of Nebraska have no power to touch him in his official character. By the constitution of that State which we have sanctioned an election is to take place for some other Governor at a future day, I do not know when; and the people cannot touch him until that day comes round; and can the people of Nebraska touch their Senators who are here? Nay, Mr. President, there is a government for Nebraska existing to-day by virtue of a law of Congress, with a Governor and judicial officers and legislative officers; and when you pass this act you withdraw from that Territory that government, the members of which are the only tribunals that can dispute the action of the State government created by the people of Nebraska. Now, I want to speak with entire respect of every proposition to amend a law here, and therefore I will not say that it is a snap game, but it looks the most like it of anything I ever saw in my life. Still I do not feel myself at liberty to call it so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my friend will not restrain himself on my account.

Mr. HOWE. Not at all. I know my friend from Vermont will not take offense; but it is a proposition pending here and I feel bound to treat it with the utmost respect. I do not see, however, yet what opportunity the people of Nebraska have to determine this question of suffrage for themselves.

Mr. CONNESS. I am interested to the extent of having a vote on this subject, and by the kindness of the Senator from Wisconsin I hope he will permit me to make a suggestion on this point.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. As I understand the Senator from Vermont, he holds that the act of admission with this amendment which he proposes has the full force of a national statute, and subordinates to it the constitution under which Nebraska is to be a State if admitted by this act; and therefore it follows according to his proposition, as I understand it, that it will not be in the power of the people of Nebraska, whether they consent to it or not, to prevent colored persons from voting, because the national statute obligates them to submit to it, and confers the power. That is my understanding of the proposition of the Senator from Vermont and his arguments in its favor; and it is in view of that understanding that I propose to vote on the subject when the question comes to a vote. I make this suggestion to the Senator from Wisconsin rather for my own benefit.

Mr. HOWE. Now, my friend will allow me to say that I am interested in bringing this question to a vote, and therefore I take the liberty of saying to him that I do not understand the Senator from Vermont to assert any such thing as that the adoption of this amendment will make a law which is paramount to the constitution of Nebraska.

Mr. CONNESS. He declares that he does say so.

Mr. HOWE. If that is what he says, I do not find it in his language here; he does not reply that to me; but on the contrary he does argue that there is reserved to the State of Nebraska somewhere the power to exclude colored men from suffrage, and he says that if she does exclude them from suffrage it works a dissolution of the State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to correct the Senator?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I say, Mr. President, is that the only power which is reserved to the people of Nebraska to exclude colored men from suffrage is the same power that is reserved to them and the people of every other State to exclude themselves from suffrage by not having any government in which suffrage can be required. They have the power to do nothing at all and become dissolved.

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President; there must be a power in Nebraska independent of that of dissolution. As I said before, when we pass this bill a new government goes into operation, and there will be municipal elections held under the protection of that government; colored men will come to the polls and offer their votes; they will be received or rejected by municipal officers responsible to that local government and not responsible to us. If they have under this law the right to vote, excluding their votes would be a wrong which that local government there should redress. Will they redress it? The Senator says if they do not redress it they will be no body; but if the court should happen to decide, on suit brought by a negro who complained that his right to vote had been abridged, that the negro had no right to vote, I take it that would not abolish the court at once. That judgment would stand, the court would go on and try the remaining cases on the calendar; and yet what would become of the right of the negro?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I trust my friend from Wisconsin will excuse me when I remind him that the colored man claiming the right to vote under an act of Congress would be entitled to take the opinion of the national tribunals as to what his rights were. I admit, certainly, as we must all admit in every case of passing a law, that if it turns out in the end by the judgment of the last tribunal that that law has not any force, nobody has any rights under it. That is clear enough, and so far as private rights are concerned those decisions must be binding; but when those decisions go so far to trench on legislative and political power as to interfere with the just prerogative of other branches of the Government, I trust we shall find means to set them right.

Mr. HOWE. So do I. Now, Mr. President, if that is what the Senator means, if it is a right conferred by a national statute, and therefore to be enforced in a national court, this talk which he indulged in yesterday in reply to the Senator from Maine, and which I have read here, about dissolving themselves by refusing this right to vote, is out of place, because refusing the right to vote does not have any tendency to dissolve the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not say yesterday that refusing the colored man the right to vote dissolved the Government. I said that if the people did not choose to exercise the functions which we authorized them to exercise by setting up that government, they would be dissolved just as the government of Wisconsin would be if her people did not exercise the rights of a State.

Mr. HOWE. I understood the Senator from Maine yesterday to ask the Senator from Vermont substantially these two questions: first, whether adopting his amendment and then passing the bill would confer the right to vote on these negroes beyond the power of Nebraska to deny it; and if it did not, what remedy would be employed in case Nebraska should refuse to grant them the right to vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will recur to the remarks of the Senator from Maine he will perceive that he does not precisely understand the interrogatory that was put. It related to the question of evidence as to whether we were to treat this State as set up in respect of being a State itself, irrespective of what should be done with colored men afterward, on this condition; and I was endeavoring to show that the action of these Senators and Representatives in going on with the government we should treat as prima facie evidence of the existence of that government. That was the point to which the remarks of the Senator from Maine were directed.

Mr. HOWE. I think on the contrary that my own understanding of the question put by the Senator from Maine is the nearest right, and so I thought I could not be mistaken in the answer given by the Senator from Vermont; but now I understand him to say that if we put this amendment into the bill we shall put the people of Nebraska under the government of a State, and put them into the Union in that shape, but with the elective franchise in the hands of a different body of people from what they have ever agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. Subject to that condition.

Mr. HOWE. Subject to no condition in the world. That is the law; there is no condition about it. They become a State; and then that government has just the same authority that the government of New York has in New York and the government of Wisconsin has there. They can die, as we are told now; they can have no government whatever. The territorial government is withdrawn; they have a State government set up; they must submit to that, with the elective franchise in the hands of a different body of people from what they have adopted. The only alternative to them is dissolution, death, the death of the State. Now, I do not think that is giving the people of Nebraska, as I said the other day, a fair chance. Putting an alternative to them which they are bound to accept or die, seems to me driving them into rather a sharp corner.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to suggest that if we pass the bill with the amendment of the Senator from Missouri we do exactly the same thing.

Mr. HOWE. Not at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, we say take that or die.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Most certainly we do for this reason: we say we admit you upon a condition which you must agree to; if you do agree to it, you are in; if you do not agree to it you are a Territory still; you are nothing as respects a State. Therefore we compel the people of the Territory, or rather that part of the people who come here, to accede to this condition before they shall exercise the functions of a State.

Mr. HOWE. We leave them with the protection of the government they have, the government of a Territory, until they have deliberately passed upon the question of suffrage or no suffrage for colored men; but we do not breathe the breath of life into their body one moment and then require them to submit to this fundamental law upon peril of dying the next moment. We leave them the protection of a territorial government; we leave them as they are till they have passed upon it and made up their minds. There is no work of dissolution about it; there is simply a withholding of the work of creation; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. The question, I understand, is on the substitution of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. ["Yes."]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fogg, Lane, Morrill, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Riddle, Sumner and Williams—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cattell, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Brown.]

Mr. WADE. I hope all the friends of the bill will vote against this amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope all the friends of the bill will vote for it, and all the friends of human freedom.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

At the end of the second section of the bill insert the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise, or of any other rights, to any person by reason of race or color; and upon the further condition that this fundamental condition shall be submitted to the voters of the Territory of Nebraska at an election to be held on the first Tuesday of — next. And at such election said voters shall declare their assent to or dissent from the condition aforesaid in such form as shall be prescribed by the Governor of said Territory. And all votes given at such election shall be returned to such Governor within — days from the day of the election, who shall forthwith canvass the same. And if a majority of such votes shall be for this condition, the Governor shall certify that fact to the President of the United States, who shall by proclamation announce the fact; whereupon, without further proceedings on the part of Congress, this act shall take effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are blanks in the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I think those can be filled up afterward, at the next stage. The vote on the amendment in its present form will try the principle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I have received this morning at my desk a telegraphic dispatch from the Senator from Missouri now absent, which I will read:

"Detained in Kentucky by illness of my father. Will leave to-morrow. "B. GRATZ BROWN."

And this is dated January 9.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Edmunds, Fessenden, Grimes, Howe, Morgan, Poland, and Sumner—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Williams—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cattell, Davis, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, McDougall, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move to amend the bill by proposing an additional section in the words of the amendment which I offered as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri before:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that precisely in the language of the previous amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The same.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I wish to make the suggestion to my friend from Vermont that I made yesterday, but perhaps he did not hear me or did not understand me. I do it with no view of defeating the amendment; but if it passes in the terms in which it is written it places the Indians in the absolute disposal of the people of the Territory. The language of the amendment is, that the State shall be admitted upon the fundamental and perpetual condition "that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed." Do you mean to leave it to the State to dispose of any of the rights of the Indians other than the mere right of suffrage?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not mean to leave the Indians to the States at all; they never are left to the States.

Mr. JOHNSON. They would be by this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; they would not. They are foreign nations; the States have no jurisdiction over them at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a question of law on which I differ from the honorable member. If that is his view and the view of the Senate, it would be a different thing; but supposing that Indians may now, those who are not taxed, be made subject to the legislation of the State, then according to this provision the State could do with the Indians just as it might think proper. They are not only denied the right of franchise, but they are denied any other right; or at least the State is authorized to deny them any other right which the State may think proper. If the honorable member thinks there is no necessity for modification on this point, I shall not press the matter.

Mr. WADE. I hope all those who want the bill to pass now will vote for this amendment; it is pure and simple and I hope they will vote for it.

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. If I understand the amendment presented by the Senator from Vermont, it is exactly the same question as that upon which we have just passed, on the substitution of this precise language now before us for the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. I hope it will not pass.

Mr. WADE. Let us have the vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Henderson, Lane, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wade—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Willey, and Williams—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cattell, Davis, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Harris, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I discussed this bill upon its merits before the holiday adjournment, and treated all the points which I think material with the exception of a single one upon which we have since obtained information. I am now satisfied that not only is this proposed State deficient in population; not only is this measure open to objection because it deals unequally with the Territories, admitting one with 50,000 population when we do not propose to admit another with 100,000, and still another with 120,000; but in addition, this constitution was rejected upon a fair vote of the qualified electors of the Territory of Nebraska. The evidence for that opinion is furnished in a statement made by a large part of the members of the Legislature of that Territory. They vouch for the facts, from which the conclusion is inevitable that this constitution was in point of fact rejected.

Now, sir, within the limited period to which by common consent debate is limited on this bill, it will not be convenient, it will not even be possible for me to go over the whole field of inquiry upon this important and vital question. But it would be a very singular thing, indeed, if a subject of this importance should undergo debate in the Senate for a very considerable period of time and should be finally committed to the judgment of the country without one word upon this point which I have now mentioned.

It is stated by the gentlemen of the Nebraska Legislature that at the Rock Bluffs precinct, in Cass county, there was a majority given against this constitution of 78 votes; that in Poll Creek precinct, in Merrick county, there was given against it a majority of 11 votes; and the returns for both these precincts were set aside by the county canvassers, so far as I can perceive, without any warrant of law whatever. By the territorial act under which those boards proceeded the returns were to be made to them of the elections in the several precincts, and the simple duty charged upon them by the statute was that they should count up those returns, declare results, issue certificates to candidates elected, and make returns to the territorial officers named in the law; but without any authority whatever those officers charged with these duties set aside the two election returns which I have mentioned; and they set them aside upon no allegation of fraud nor for any other objection which was fundamental or material to the validity of those elections. They set aside the main one of Rock Bluffs, as I understand the case, on two grounds alone. The first was that the election officers had adjourned one hour during the election for the purpose of getting their dinners, and afterward, later in the day, again one hour for the purpose of obtaining their suppers; but during those recesses the election boxes were in charge of two of the officers of the election. The other objection was that all the election papers were not certified by the election officers. They united them together in a single bundle, roll, or book, and certified the whole mass by one general certificate; whereas upon the construction which these canvassers gave to the law it was directory upon them that they should certify each paper separately. Such objections, under election laws as they are understood in the various States, were not material. They were at most only irregularities, not affecting the validity of the election. In the smaller precinct of Poll Creek the rejection of the return was for similar slight irregularities, and it was equally unwarranted and unjust.

Then, sir, it is alleged that an Indian agent in the Territory, named Matthewson, holding an appointment under this Government and who had been there only four months, not only voted himself, but polled the votes of eighteen half-breed Indians who were under his control. Here we have 19 illegal votes in favor of this constitution under which the State is to be admitted, if admitted at all. Six months residence in the Territory is necessary to the right of voting, and the Indians or half-breeds, of course, were not qualified electors.

Then, as to the point discussed at the last session, relative to the voting of Iowa soldiers: their votes were cast at Fort Kearney, I believe. At that election poll, which was opened for the first regiment of Nebraska volunteers, 134 votes were cast for the constitution and 24 against it. At that poll it is alleged that 40 of the soldiers who thus voted for the constitution were Iowa soldiers, who had never resided in Nebraska except for the purposes of the military service; and by the fifth section of the organic act of Nebraska Territory it is provided "that no soldier shall be allowed to vote or hold office in said Territory by reason of being in service therein;" so that there can be no question that these 40 votes also are to be deducted in coming to a proper conclusion upon the question whether this constitution was adopted by the people of Nebraska or not.

These several corrections amount to 148 votes. As there was reported in favor of the adoption of the constitution a majority of only 100, it follows, upon the making of these corrections, that the constitution was in fact rejected by a majority of 48. We are not concluded by the proceedings of the territorial officers, by the action of the boards of election, nor by the action of the county canvassers, through whose hands the returns passed. When these facts are called to our attention we are obliged to investigate them as far as the information in our power will enable us to do, and to determine the case as if no result had been certified to us by the officers of the Territory to whom the general returns were sent.

Observe, sir, that election was not held under any act of Congress. It had no sanction of public law other than that of the territorial Legislature itself; and under the regulations of the territorial law there was no authority to pervert and to change returns any more than to poll improper votes. But not only were illegal votes taken in the two cases mentioned, but the election returns were changed in an unauthorized and unjust manner by the boards of canvassers.

I have called these facts distinctly to the attention of the Senate, in order that they may accompany the volume of our debates and enable those who examine our proceedings to judge whether the weight of the argument in this case is in behalf of or in opposition to the passage of the bill. I will state further, that the exhibit of facts from which I have quoted is signed by five members of the Senate and sixteen members of the House or delegates of the Territory of Nebraska, constituting a very large part of the members of the Legislature. They certify and declare that, at the election in their Territory on the question of adopting or rejecting this constitution, it was in fact rejected; that the actual and honest votes given by qualified citizens upon the question is represented by a majority of 48 votes against the constitution, instead of a majority of 100 votes in its favor.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, before recording my vote on the passage of this bill, I desire to say just a word or two. At the last session I supported and voted for the admission of Colorado under circumstances similar to those now connected with this bill proposing the admission of Nebraska. I then supposed, and now believe, that under the enabling acts which Congress had passed heretofore these Territories coming here in good faith were entitled to admission as States. I believed the enabling act was a continuing invitation to the people of these Territories, and notwithstanding they may have been irregular in their proceedings and not have adopted a State constitution at the first trial, I still believe that Congress is bound in good faith to receive them into the Union.

The objection then urged to the constitution of Colorado, that it excluded blacks from the right of suffrage, is now urged to the constitution of Nebraska. I felt fully the force of that objection before, and feel it now; but I believed then and believe now that this right will sooner be guaranteed to these few individuals by admitting these States into the Union than by rejecting them. I shall therefore vote cheerfully for the admission of this State whether the bill be amended or not. I voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, not because I am fully persuaded that that amendment has any force whatever; I am inclined to doubt it; but I believed that it might harmonize the friends of the measure here so that we should be able to carry it. I shall now vote most cheerfully under the circumstances for the bill as it comes from the committee.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to renew the last proposition on which the Senate voted, that moved by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That can be done when the bill shall have been reported to the Senate, but it is not now in order.

Mr. SUMNER. I see that the Senator from Vermont is here now, and I call his attention to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move the same amendment which I offered in committee, to add the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgement or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

Mr. WADE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not intend to prolong the debate; but I was absent when the vote was taken on this same proposition a while ago, and I wish now simply to state that I am in favor of admitting Nebraska without any amendment, without any qualification, without any condition, and I think it is an unwise policy to impose conditions on the admission of Nebraska; but still, as the friends of the measure think that the declaration drafted by the Senator from Vermont will strengthen the bill, I am rather disposed to vote for it. I believe it will be entirely nugatory. I do not think that we have the power by an act of Congress to restrain the people of Nebraska from framing such a constitution, republican in form, as they choose. I have no doubt they can amend this constitution, or they can disregard this condition; it does not operate on them; it is not really in the nature of a condition. I vote for it simply because I believe its adoption will strengthen the main measure and enable us to admit the State of Nebraska into the Union with her Senators and Representatives.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Fowler, Lane, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wade—20.
NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Willey, and Williams—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Davis, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fogg, Fowler, Henderson, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, and Saulsbury—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Davis, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Harris, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—13.

So the bill was passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 5th ultimo, calling for copies of orders, instructions, and directions issued from the Navy Department in relation to the employment of officers and others at the navy-yards of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 177) to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 462, for the admission of Colorado.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the unfinished business which was laid aside for the Nebraska bill now comes up regularly.

Several SENATORS. Do not call that up. We can act on Colorado without discussion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to my friend from Ohio taking up his bill informally without displacing the business to which I allude.

The motion of Mr. WADE was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 462) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It recites that on the 21st day of March, 1864, Congress passed an act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and offered to admit the State, when so formed, into the Union upon compliance with certain conditions therein specified; and that it appears by a message of the President of the United States, dated January —, 1866, that the people of Colorado have adopted a constitution, which upon due examination is found to conform to the provisions and comply with the conditions of said act, and to be republican in its form of government, and that they now ask for admission into the Union. It is therefore proposed to declare that the constitution and State government which the people of Colorado have for themselves shall be, and is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed; and the State of Colorado is declared to be one of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill by adding a section which I will read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Colorado there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

Mr. WADE. I inquire of the Senator if that is the same amendment we have just fixed on the other bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Precisely the same.

Mr. WADE. Very well.

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Fowler, Henderson, Lane, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wade—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Willey, and Williams—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Davis, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Harris, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the passage of this bill I intend simply to refer to the facts that were brought out in debate at the last session. The proceedings by which the constitution was adopted in this case were much more irregular, if possible, than those upon the adoption of a constitution in Nebraska. There was not even the action of the territorial Legislature upon the subject. The people first rejected the constitution that was adopted by a convention pursuant to the enabling act; and after that, after such rejection, the chairman of the committees of the political parties of the Territory called another convention, and upon that most irregular proceeding a constitution was presented and was voted upon by the people, I believe not according to law. I do not recollect certainly upon that subject; but I believe that even the vote upon the constitution was not at any regular election or pursuant to any law of the Territory whatever. Upon that vote less than six thousand persons voted, and it was claimed that a majority of one hundred and fifty was cast in favor of the constitution. Now, upon that showing it is claimed that the State ought to be admitted. I cannot bring my judgment to agree to that. Nor has it ever been claimed that in the Territory of Colorado there is nearly so large a population as in Nebraska. I think the evidence before the Senate shows the fact that in Colorado there is less than 80,000 people. I judge, sir, by the census of 1860 the census taken in 1860, the vote taken in 1861, and the vote at the subsequent elections. When by the census of 1860 she had a population of 25,000 the vote was 10,000. When the people of the Territory came to vote upon this constitution it was less I believe than 6,000; I may not be exactly correct; less perhaps than 7,000; much less, at any rate, than at the election of 1861, showing, so far as we may judge by the popular vote, a less population at the time this constitution was voted upon than when the census was taken, which showed the entire population of the Territory to be but 25,000.

Now, sir, as a representative from the State of Indiana, a State with a population very nearly if not quite a million and a half, I cannot vote to give thirty thousand people in the Territory of Colorado the voice in the Senate which is given under the Constitution to the million and a half of people that I in part represent.

It is not right, Mr. President. There is no evidence before the Senate that shows the population to be larger than I have suggested; and I understood this morning, though I will not say that it is certainly so, that in a recent message delivered to the Legislature by the Governor of the Territory he makes the population to be twenty-nine thousand. I have not seen that message or communication, but I understood that such an opinion has been expressed by the Governor of the Territory, that the population is about twenty-nine thousand; not, in his judgment, to exceed that. If I am misinformed upon this subject I should like to be corrected; but taking the evidence that we have before us the population cannot exceed thirty or thirty-five thousand at the very extreme. I believe thirty-five thousand was claimed at the last session by the advocates of this bill.

Then, Mr. President, it is proposed now to bring into the Union as a State a section of country with a population of thirty or thirty-five thousand. I submit to Senators whether this is according to the spirit of our institutions, or whether, as between the States, it is just and right.

But, sir, if the population were ever so sufficient I could not vote for the bill with the amendment which has just been adopted—the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont. That amendment is simply on the part of Congress a proposition to change the constitution of the proposed State, to incorporate a provision not found there when it came from the hands of the people.

So far as I know this is the first time that the Congress of the United States has undertaken to change the constitution adopted by the people upon a bill proposing to admit a State. The Senator from Vermont claims that this provision of the bill will pass into the State constitution, or rather will control it and be permanent in its character, for he uses the word "perpetual," I believe, in the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will allow me, I think there is a precedent here of very nearly the same character in the admission of the State of California. The third section of that act is—"That the said State of California is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that the people of said State, through their Legislature or otherwise, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within its limits, and shall pass no law and do no act whereby the title of the United States to and right to dispose of the same shall be impaired or questioned; and that they shall never lay any tax or assessment of any description whatsoever upon the public domain of the United States; and in no case shall non-resident proprietors who are citizens of the United States be taxed higher than residents."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that the answer made by the Senator from Michigan—

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to call attention to the point. The question of State taxation is admitted by all to be especially within the jurisdiction of a State; but here Congress provided that non-resident proprietors should not be taxed higher than resident proprietors in a State. The subject of taxation is certainly within State jurisdiction, and yet here Congress imposes a condition that a State shall not do a thing clearly within State jurisdiction. It seems to me it is an analogous power to the one proposed to be exercised in this case.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I thought the answer to the logical force and legal force of those precedents had been so fully given by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] that I was justified in saying that Congress had never before undertaken to do what is now proposed, to change the constitution, which it is claimed the people have agreed to. The provision to which the Senator from Nevada has referred I believe is found in most of the laws admitting the States, or if not in the laws admitting the States, in the enabling acts; and I should think there would be no occasion to provide in the admission of any State as is provided in the section read by the Senator from Nevada. The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress in express terms the disposal of the public lands, the right to control the public lands; to regulate the public lands in every respect. But at one time, as was said by the Senator from Michigan, it was claimed that after a State had been admitted and had become a sovereign in the Union, it then might have a control over the lands within her limits. That doctrine, however, has long since been abandoned. For thirty years I believe it has not been claimed by any Senator or Representative. Congress has the exclusive and entire control of the public lands, their disposal as the owner of the public lands, and may make all laws necessary to protect its own interests as owner of the lands therein. It may not only provide for the sale of the lands, but it may provide for the protection of the lands while it owns them; and in order to secure a sale of the lands upon advantageous terms, it may protect its purchasers. It is upon that ground that Congress has claimed the right to secure the persons to whom it may sell the lands exemption from unequal taxation.

It was the interest of Congress to dispose of the lands in California. In order to secure the disposal of those lands upon advantageous terms, Congress provided that the persons who purchased the lands, whether they lived in California or elsewhere, should not be exposed to unequal and unjust taxation. It is under the power to control the public lands and to dispose of them that Congress undertakes to protect the purchaser when he may not be a resident of the State, and it is not claimed for Congress under any power to control the constitution of a State simply because her people ask for admission into the Union.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to ask, is the question of suffrage any more within exclusive State jurisdiction than the question of State taxation?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is that all you wish to ask?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In my judgment they both belong to the State so far as her own revenue is concerned; but the question of the Senator simply calls upon me to repeat what I have said. Congress controls the disposal of the public lands. In order to secure that disposal it may do whatever is necessary to protect its interests; and to protect its interests as the owner of the lands, with a view to their disposal, upon advantageous terms, it provides that non-residents of the State who may buy them shall not be exposed to unequal taxation.

Mr. STEWART. But how does the interest of Congress in that question give it the right to interfere with the State power of taxation? May we not say upon the same principle that it is the interest of Congress, in order to guarantee republican government and enforce republican principles, to see that all men shall have a voice in the Government? But how does the fact of either provision, being for the interest of this Government, affect the power of Congress to interfere with the action of the State? If the question of taxation is exclusively within State jurisdiction, it does not make any difference for what reason Congress exercises the power to impose a condition on the exercise of that jurisdiction of the State. It is a question of power and not of the reason for using the power. If the question of taxation is entirely with the State, and it is partially taken away by the act of admission, Congress exercises a power which the State would otherwise have under our system. That matter is no more a question of State jurisdiction than the matter of suffrage is claimed to be entirely within State jurisdiction. In either case, admitting that the power is with the State, Congress imposes upon the State a condition that she shall not exercise that power in a certain way. I cannot see that the cases are not entirely analogous.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, it is disagreeable for me at any time to repeat an argument which has been made more ably than I can make it myself; and as I thought the argument upon this very question, made by the Senator from Michigan the other day, was exhaustive in its character, I very reluctantly answered the question of the Senator from Nevada.

Without reference to precedents, none of which I think do bear upon the question now before the Senate, I cannot vote for a bill which proposes to change a constitution which it is claimed has been adopted by the people of a new State. What is the force of this amendment? If the State be admitted, she is a State, having the control, after her admission, of her own constitution. Can she amend that constitution? It has always been conceded that the States, by proper proceedings, had the power to amend their constitutions; but if Congress has the power to impose a perpetual condition upon the State in regard to any one matter, then in regard to that matter the power of amendment is taken away from the State and from the people.

Mr. President, I have said all that I feel it my duty to say upon this question, and shall be satisfied now to give my vote. I think the people of Colorado have not sufficient population to justify a representation in the Senate and a representation in the other House. I think that the adoption of this constitution was so irregular as to give it no moral force before this body. It was not pursuant to the enabling act; it was not in accordance with the requirements of the enabling act; but it was a party political movement in the Territory, not regulated by law and the polls not guarded by the provisions of law. In every respect I consider the bill objectionable.

Mr. WILLEY. I desire, sir, to explain the vote which I propose to cast on this bill. I voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, but I shall vote for the bill now that the amendment has been made a part of the bill. I am anxious that Colorado shall be admitted as a State into the Union. I do not think that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont and which has been attached to the bill amounts to anything. As I understand the Constitution, the right to regulate suffrage belongs exclusively to the States themselves. That is the law paramount; and any bill which Congress may pass proposing to regulate for a State the right of suffrage or to require a State to regulate the right of suffrage in any particular manner, is in my opinion nugatory, unavailing, amounts to nothing; and therefore the bill, if it pass with this amendment to it, will simply result in the admission of Colorado into the Union as a member of the Union, and the amendment attached to it will have no effect upon the State of Colorado in reference to suffrage. Being desirous that Colorado should be admitted now, and believing that the amendment is nugatory, I shall vote for the bill with the amendment to it, notwithstanding I voted against the amendment itself.

Mr. GRIMES. For precisely the same reason assigned by the Senator from West Virginia why he shall vote for the bill, I shall vote against it. He admits, as is admitted by everybody, I believe, on the floor of the Senate, except the Senator from Vermont, that the amendment which has been adopted to the Colorado bill, as well as the one that was adopted to the Nebraska bill, is entirely nugatory. Even the chairman of the Committee on Territories, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] spent an hour or two the other day in convincing us that it was of no effect, unconstitutional, and void. Now, sir, my conscience on this subject of impartial suffrage in the Territories cannot be quieted, as it seems some gentlemen's consciences can be, by the incorporation into this organic act of a provision which I know cannot be enforced, and which, according to the testimony of the opinion of almost every one who has spoken on the subject at all, merely consigns the colored man who happens to reside within these Territories to a law-suit rather than to the ballot-box. Therefore, for the reason which the Senator from West Virginia has assigned why he will vote for the bill, that he believes that amendment to be entirely void and of no effect, I shall vote against this bill for the admission of Colorado.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, there are certain facts in relation to the Territory of Colorado which do not exist to the same extent in relation to the Territory of Nebraska; and the facts to which I should like to call the attention of the Senate, if it were possible to get it, are those facts which bear upon the population of Colorado and which bear upon the question of whether the population of Colorado do or do not desire to assume the burdens of a State government.

I shall not go over the ground, nor repeat what was said by me when the bill for the admission of Colorado was before the Senate on another occasion. The facts which I then stated I believe to be true; but I have some further additional facts and testimony bearing on those two questions, testimony which comes from an official source; testimony which it seems to me every Senator in his place here is bound to regard at least with respect, though he may not concur entirely in the opinions which are expressed. I refer to the statement of the Governor of Colorado made on the 18th of the last month, of December, in his message to the Legislature of Colorado, a copy of which I have now before me. The Governor of Colorado states that—"It would be idle to attempt to conceal the fact that there are two parties to this issue in the Territory, although strenuous efforts have been made to create the impression abroad that the people were united on the question. But here, where the evidence is readily attainable, it would be equally idle to deny that the party desiring a State government forms a very small portion of the population, and is represented by those who seek personal aggrandizement and place at the expense of the welfare of the Territory."

"It may not be amiss to give a brief history of this question from the beginning.

"Congress, in 1864, passed a law to enable the people to form a State government if they desired to do so. After a very thorough discussion of the subject, they decided that it was inexpedient to adopt a State government.

"This seemed to close the question; the power under the act of Congress, being completely exhausted; but in 1865 a movement was made by a few aspiring men to effect, if possible, a reconsideration of this decision. A convention was called in which only eleven counties out of seventeen were represented. By this convention a constitution was framed, which it is pretended was adopted by a majority of one hundred and fifty-five. There was no law governing this vote and no restraints whatever surrounded the proceedings, and the so-called vote was no indication of the sentiment of the people."

"The Legislature at its last session, feeling the wrong that was attempted to be put upon them by forcing a State government on the people under the representation that there was a population numbering between fifty and sixty thousand to bear the expenses, authorized a census to be taken by the assessors of the different counties, paying them a compensation per capita of six cents for every name returned, the work to be done in connection with the annual assessments. Returns have been received from the following counties, namely:

Gilpin.....	6,847
Jefferson.....	1,782
Boulder.....	1,456
Conejos.....	2,269
Costilla.....	2,192
Las Animas.....	935
Fremont.....	508
Summit.....	456
Park.....	552
El Paso.....	565
Arapahoe.....	4,145
Douglas.....	542
Weld.....	1,192
Pueblo.....	890

Amounting to.....24,331

"These returns all show upon their face marked evidence of the care with which the work has been done and the population enumerated, and their accuracy is acquiesced in by every portion of the Territory with the exception of a single county, and of the correctness of that one there is no reason to doubt.

"From the following counties no returns have been received, and the population is estimated by persons conversant with the condition of the counties, including members of the Legislature representing them, namely:

Larimer.....	600
Clear Creek.....	1,600
Huerfano.....	1,000
Lake.....	600

Making.....3,800

Making an aggregate of 27,931.

"This result will doubtless produce great disappointment in the public mind because of the studied effort to create the impression that the population was much larger, although the prudent, thinking portion of the community—those who have the taxes to pay and the burden of the government to sustain—felt assured all the while that the effort was a merely selfish one to support the ambitious schemes of designing men. The exaggerations of the population have been but a small portion of the misrepresentation by which they sought to accomplish their purpose.

"The fact that the population is small does us no harm; the truth never does injury; it is only the perversion that does mischief."

"Since the adjournment of the last Legislative Assembly I have traversed almost the entire area of the Territory, mingling freely with every portion of its citizens, among the miners and in the agricultural districts, and I am convinced that at least two thirds of the people are adverse to the formation of a State government. In whole sections the entire population are opposed to it with scarcely a dissenting voice, while in no portion is there any considerable degree of unanimity in its favor. If this opinion is doubted its accuracy can be easily ascertained by affording the people a fair opportunity to speak for themselves.

"If Congress desires the admission of the State, and the people of the Territory wish it, the admission can be consummated at the next session with equal advantage to every interest that could be obtained by admitting it now."

Now, Mr. President, I have read at some little length the statement made by the Governor of Colorado as to a census which was taken under a law of the last Legislative Assembly of that Territory requiring the assessors to take an enumeration of the population, and by that enumeration all told there are but twenty-seven thousand inhabitants in this Territory of Colorado. There is not a dollar in the treasury. The people are not in a condition to bear the burdens of a State government; they will of necessity be involved in debt; and if it is admitted into the Union the scrip of this new State within one year from this date will be selling at less than fifty cents on the dollar beyond all question, and the people burdened with a taxation they cannot well bear.

Mr. President, when such are the facts why is it that the admission of this Territory as a State should be so pressed upon the Senate of the United States? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] has over and over again declared the real purpose of bringing this Territory in as a State, although he himself, in the beginning of the discussion, and before the political necessities had pressed upon him as they have been pressing upon him of late, in an argument which he has not answered and which has not been and cannot be answered, showed conclusively that this Territory of Colorado was in no condition to be admitted as a State into the Union. But, sir, there are other reasons, pressing reasons, reasons of political necessity he would have us understand. It is necessary to reinforce a majority of three fourths in this body by the admission of new members from the new State of Colorado, and that is the reason why this is to be pressed. Sir, I should not speak of this if the honorable Senator had not over and over again avowed that his purpose was to bring in reinforcements; and this is the great anxiety which he has for the passage of this bill. Sir, it is a new argument in the Senate of the United States to press upon the Senate what their judgment does not approve, from considerations of political necessity, to strengthen a party or for any political purpose whatever. And, Mr. President, a new style of argument has arisen, too, in reference to constitutional questions, which I never heard before, to wit: that the Senate are called upon to vote in favor of measures conceded to be unconstitutional because it is said being unconstitutional they are perfectly nugatory. Of course I will not assume to judge for other persons; but I do not see how it is possible for me to consent to vote for a proposition which I believe to be unconstitutional because its being unconstitutional will make it nugatory and of no account. It is in vain to say that if we vote for an unconstitutional law it is null and void, and therefore it may be disregarded by the people who are to be affected by it, or it may be overruled by the judgment of the Supreme Court or any other tribunal. That does not excuse us in my judgment. I do not know but that others can see their way clear to excuse this matter to their own consciences in view of the oath they have taken to support the Constitution of the United States; but I cannot see how I can vote for a proposition which violates the Constitution when I have sworn to defend it. It seems to me that it is illogical, it is preposterous; and I for one cannot reconcile it with my sense of the obligations which I owe to the oath that I have taken.

Now, Mr. President, I shall not go over the argument as to the proposed amendment to show its unconstitutionality, and that with the exception of perhaps two or three gentlemen who have expressed their opinion upon this subject it is conceded to be unconstitutional. If Congress has this power on the admission of a new State to propose by an ordinance or a law perpetually binding forever upon the State that the State shall make no distinction between its citizens on the ground of color so far as the exercise of the franchise is concerned, Congress may say the same thing in relation to any distinction of sex. Congress has the power to impose upon a new State equal, universal woman suffrage as well as negro suffrage or Indian suffrage. There is no limit. But, sir, the answer given is that being against the Constitution it is of no account, it amounts to nothing; and therefore we can vote for it. Why, Mr. President, this is the strangest argument I have ever heard anywhere. I am certain that such an argument is a very novel one in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, I fear that it is another evidence of that revolution through which we are passing, which may in its progress involve all our institutions, Constitution and all; for if men here can disregard it, how shall we expect that the Constitution will be respected elsewhere?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin seems to assume that somebody has said that he was at liberty to disregard the Constitution of the United States in voting upon propositions pending in this body.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not refer to anything said by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator says he did not refer to the remarks I made. Well, sir, let me state my view of the proposition under debate. We have the undoubted constitutional power to admit the State of Colorado with or without conditions. We have the right to impose such conditions on the State of Colorado as we see proper. It is clearly within our constitutional power to do so. In this case it is proposed to impose a condition, without requiring Colorado to accept it, and it therefore has no force or validity whatever. We may impose conditions upon the admission of a State, and if those conditions are assented to they become a part of the compact between the State and the United States. Every law for the admission of a State into the Union has contained conditions declared to be fundamental in their character. The act for the admission of the first State that was admitted, the State of Tennessee, contained such conditions. When the State of Ohio was admitted there were three or four fundamental conditions, and the people of that State were required to assent to them before Ohio was admitted into the Union. In this case a proposition is made to declare a certain doctrine a fundamental condition, but the State is not asked to assent to it, and it therefore, in my judgment, has no force or effect whatever.

Still, that Congress has power to make this condition or to declare this condition I have not a doubt. Congress may ingraft upon the Colorado bill the Ten Commandments or the Lord's Prayer, or a great many other good things for which I should be willing to vote at all times and in all places, but yet unless we required the people of the State to assent to those conditions they would be of no force whatever. Therefore when a proposition is made to declare any fundamental doctrine, or any fundamental principle, or any code of ethics or law a condition, I do not feel restrained from voting for it, because I do not believe it will have any effect; and if other Senators who are also in favor of the main proposition will be inclined to vote for it if this be adopted as a part of the bill, I am not disinclined to give them that opportunity. I think there is no inconsistency in the position that I have occupied, nor in the position occupied by the Senator from West Virginia. He was opposed to a certain amendment; he voted against it. That is done constantly. Propositions and amendments are offered against which Senators vote, and yet they vote for the original proposition even if amended. I see nothing inconsistent in this and nothing to call for unreasonable criticism.

A word now in regard to the population of Colorado. The Governor of the Territory of Colorado, who will be legislated out of office by this bill, is very much opposed to the passage of the bill. I saw him myself when I was in Colorado recently. It seems he got up a census upon his own authority of the number of inhabitants there. It was a matter of common remark that in some of the counties the census was not taken at all, in many of the counties it was imperfect, and no reliance and no attention was paid to it whatever. No one took the pains to be enrolled on his census, and I think that no sufficient steps were taken to secure a full enumeration of the inhabitants of Colorado; and yet I feel bound to state that from the best information I could get in Colorado there were not more than forty or fifty thousand people in the Territory who were permanent citizens. I do not think the highest estimate I heard placed upon it by disinterested men was over fifty thousand. Still they have all the elements of a State. The town of Denver is a flourishing little city, well built, well constructed. The Pacific railroad is rapidly approaching Colorado, and next summer will enter upon its northern border. What is called the Kansas branch of the Pacific railroad is pushing out rapidly toward Colorado and will soon reach it. The capital invested in mining in Colorado amounts to many million dollars and needs protection. Indian wars are about to occur in that immediate neighborhood. There is no doubt that we shall soon have collisions with the Cheyennes, as I believe they are called, and also with the Sioux, and perhaps the Utes and other tribes on the immediate border and in Colorado. The military authorities will be moving there in their military operations. It seems to me that under these circumstances it is important for the protection of the white people of Colorado that some kind of a government other than a territorial government shall be found there.

It is a well-known fact that there is great hostility between the present territorial government and a large portion, and I think a majority of the people of Colorado. Who is at fault in this matter I cannot state; but it is certain, in my judgment, although that is a disputed point, that a majority of the people of Colorado desire to get rid of that territorial government. That territorial government is now an expense to the nation. I believe a majority of the people of Colorado desire to substitute for it a State government. There is no practical objection against the adoption of a State government in Colorado except that it gives them for a time at least undue representation in the Senate and House. Under the circumstances by which they are surrounded, with a large amount of capital developing their mining industry, with a rapidly growing population, with Indian hostilities springing up all around them, when they ask us for a State government which will compel them to pay the expenses of that State government, it seems to me not unreasonable that we should waive the meagerness of their population, the undue political power it will give them for the time being, and admit them as a State. Within two years from this time, perhaps within less, they will have the requisite population to elect a member of the House of Representatives under the existing law. They will then have the right, by the precedents that we have already adopted, to admission. We now waive for one or two sessions of Congress the meagerness of their population and the undue political power they will have in this body and in the House. I do not think that the case of Colorado is as strong as the case of Nebraska. Nebraska, in my judgment, is better prepared and better fitted for a State government, and their people are more united on the question of a State government, than they are in Colorado; but still I think, under the circumstances by which these people are surrounded, it would be an act of wisdom on the part of Congress to give them the management of their own affairs by the organization of a State government, and I shall therefore vote for it.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I do not presume now to go into the arguments which have been made on the bill over and over again on the other side of the Chamber as to the want of population in this Territory and a great many other things; but I have a letter here from the executive clerk of the Governor of Colorado, which reveals some facts that perhaps throw some light on the opinions contained in the Governor's message, which gentlemen have handed around here. The Governor feels, I believe, a little interest in keeping the position that he has got; but let us hear the letter, which I have sent up, from his executive clerk, as regards the vote in Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The letter will be read, no objection being interposed.

The Secretary read as follows:

DENVER, COLORADO TERRITORY,
November 10, 1866.

SIR: I desire to inform you that my certificate affixed to the false table of the different votes cast in Colorado, which was laid before Congress at the last session, was obtained from me by fraud, as follows: I made a table of the votes from the retained copy on file in the office of the secretary of the Territory for the New York Tribune Almanac, by order of Governor Cummings, and one of his household, writing at the same table, made a duplicate, or professed to do so. The copy made by me was compared with the original and sent to the room of the Governor.

After some hours, a paper represented to me as the duplicate was returned to my table by the party who had made it, with the request from Governor Cummings that I would officially certify to it, and with the remark that it had been compared and was correct. I complied with the request, without accurate examination and without suspicion of treachery, as it was mailed, as I then believed, to the New York Tribune Almanac.

The table of votes thus certified to by me is the one that was laid before the last session of Congress, and is false and grossly unjust to this Territory.

I was not aware of the imposition practiced upon me until too late to correct the false impression it created; but I avail myself of the first opportunity to do so and to vindicate my own character, and I confidently trust that you will lay this letter before Congress as an act of justice to this Territory and to myself.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
D. A. CHEEVER,

Late Executive Clerk Colorado Territory.
Hon. BENJAMIN F. WADE, United States Senate, chairman Committee on Territories, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WADE. I have another letter from the Secretary of the Territory which throws some light upon the question of the population of the Territory, which I should like to have read in this connection.

The Secretary read as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
COLORADO TERRITORY,
GOLDEN CITY, November 10, 1866.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor, bearing date the 5th instant, in relation to the census returns now on file in my office, and asking for a statement of the same if compatible with the public interest.

In responding to your desire for information on this subject, it would perhaps be proper to give a general synopsis of the result, so far as they have been received, but not having immediate access to my official records, I can only furnish the total footings of the twelve counties thus far reported. These exhibit a population of twenty-two thousand souls. Six of the most important in wealth and numbers—excepting Gilpen and Arrapahoe—are yet to be heard from. In this connection it may be well to state that many of the assessors while in the prosecution of their assessments were entirely ignorant of the duties imposed by the law regulating census returns, copies of which, though promptly forwarded, failed to reach them in time to be of service. Others were not advised by any recognized authority that such a law had been passed until after their assessment rolls had been returned to the county clerks. I am also informed that in not a few localities no effort was made to record the non-tax-paying residents, and that only such names were taken down as came properly within their jurisdiction as assessors of taxable property. In the second largest and most populous mining county (Clear Creek) no census has been made because of the refusal of the officer assigned to that duty to act for the sum specified in the law. I am further assured by prominent citizens of Denver that a private census has been taken which places the population of that city alone at a greater number than was returned by the assessor for the entire county. The interest you have manifested in the material prosperity of our Territory induces me to present these facts in vindication of the people from the gross misstatements now in circulation throughout the eastern States, fomented by disloyal politicians with the express design of defeating the admission of the State at the coming session of Congress.

Your obedient servant,
FRANK HALL,
Secretary and Acting Governor of Colorado.
Hon. JOHN EVANS,
United States Senator-elect for Colorado.

Mr. WADE. I do not propose now to make any comments on those two papers unless some other gentleman should see fit to do so. I am anxious for a vote, although under other circumstances I should think it well enough to reply to some things that the Senator from Wisconsin has said; but I will take some other occasion for that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, no doubt the action of Congress upon these two bills will be hereafter referred to as a precedent, and I desire simply to say enough to show that while I vote for the bills, I do not acquiesce in the doctrines of the amendment or the views of the gentlemen who support it. Nobody will contend—I presume the author of this amendment will not contend—that Congress has any power to regulate the right of suffrage in the State of Vermont; and if so, then when Nebraska becomes a State in the Union Congress has no power to regulate the right of suffrage in the State of Nebraska by any legislation prior to or subsequent to the date of its admission, unless Nebraska stands in the Union in an inferior condition to the State of Vermont. I find in the second section of the first article of the Constitution this provision:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Now, according to all construction, that has ever been put upon that section of the Constitution, the right of a State to prescribe the qualifications for the electors of the most numerous branch of its own assembly has been recognized. Does the Senator or anybody else pretend that Congress can prescribe the qualifications for the voters in the State of Nebraska for the members of its own Legislature? If the Constitution of the United States confers that power upon one State, it confers the same power upon all the States; and when Nebraska is changed from a Territory to a State, the Constitution, independent and regardless of any legislation by Congress, endows that State with this constitutional right. No law of Congress can deprive a State of any constitutional right. If this act of admission should prescribe as a fundamental condition that the State of Nebraska should have but one Senator in Congress, I will ask the honorable Senator if it would be a valid and binding condition?

Reference has been made to conditions attached to other acts of admission; but the honorable Senators who have referred to those acts as precedents have failed to make a palpable distinction between the two cases. I undertake to say that no reference can be made to any condition attached to any act of admission that was at the time in conflict with the constitution of the State or of the United States. The point which I make upon this amendment is, that it is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States as well as in conflict with the constitution of the State. Nebraska at this time is a Territory. Congress has an undoubted right to prescribe the qualifications of voters in that Territory; but when Nebraska becomes a State the right of Congress ceases. Otherwise there is no difference between a State and a Territory, and both stand upon the same footing so far as the power of Congress is concerned. That is the view that I take of this proposed condition; that it cannot be valid because it is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and the State, when it is changed from a Territory, acquires under the Constitution a right that cannot be taken away by any legislation on the part of Congress.

Now, it is claimed that at this time, because Nebraska is a Territory, Congress can enact some law that will operate in Nebraska after Nebraska becomes a State which Congress cannot enact after the act of admission is passed. I think there is a gross fallacy in that position. It is for these reasons, in brief, without undertaking to elaborate the subject, as it has been very thoroughly discussed, that I have opposed these amendments. I cannot consent to vote in this Senate for a doctrine which recognizes the right of Congress to say that a new State admitted into the Union shall not have the same rights in the Union under the Constitution that any of the old States have. I do not believe that it is right or constitutional for Congress to make any distinction between States; and I say that when Nebraska is admitted into the Union and her Senators and Representatives take their seats on the floors of Congress, Nebraska in the Union has precisely the same power under the Constitution of the United States to control the right of suffrage that Vermont or New York has.

These are my views of the amendment; but I shall vote for the bill as amended. These views have been overruled by a majority of the Senate. I believe it is of great importance to the people of Colorado that that Territory should be made a State, and I do not intend to allow a measure of this importance to be defeated, so far as my vote is concerned, because an amendment has been attached to the bill which I have opposed, and which, in my judgment, will have no force and effect.

I will state one other objection to this amendment. When Colorado is admitted with this amendment attached to the bill the people of that State will be unable to determine what right or power they have over this question. Send this constitution with this amendment attached to it, accompanied by the conflicting views that have been expressed here to-day upon the subject, to the people of Colorado, and what decision can they make as to their rights? Controversy, confusion, and possibly disorder will be introduced into that Territory by the various constructions that may be put upon this amendment. Some will contend that this amendment, as has been admitted by some of its supporters here, is invalid; and so the people will be divided; doubts upon the subject will obtain; controversies will arise; and it will be, as it seems to me, more, of an injury to the people than an advantage; and I doubt very much whether it will secure to the class of persons for whose benefit it is brought forward those rights which it is intended to secure to them. So long as so many of the honorable Senators here have stood upon this floor and acknowledged that it was invalid, those who are opposed to it in Colorado will take advantage of that exposition of the amendment in the Senate and claim that it has no force and effect.

My opinion is that this application ought to have been rejected or it ought to have been adopted; the State ought to have been compelled to change its constitution in accordance with the wishes of Congress, or it should have been admitted with a constitution such as the people choose to make; and I regret that this amendment has been adopted, not because I think it will affect anything in Colorado, but I am apprehensive that we have put upon the record a precedent here to-day that will return to plague the inventors.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, I do not know how far the moral criticism of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] was designed to be applicable to me. I have only to say, however, in reference to the vote which I gave, that I cast it in accordance with my convictions of what I conceived to be right and proper under the circumstances; and further to say that in casting that vote, as in casting any vote which I may see proper to do, I hold myself responsible to my own conscience, and not to the Senator from Wisconsin. I imagine that honorable Senator will have quite as much as he will find himself able to do if he takes care of matters that affect himself, and allows his brother Senators to be the judges of what is proper in the discharge of their own duty.

I have now nothing to take back in regard to the remarks which I made. I simply voted in the first place against the amendment of the Senator from Vermont because I was opposed to it. I shall vote for the bill with that amendment attached to it because I am in favor of the principle of the bill and of the admission of Colorado as a State into the Union. I believe that the amendment is simply nugatory and no more; that it can have no effect upon the people of Colorado. If I believed that it could have, I would be the last man to attempt to impose upon them a law which I believed to be unconstitutional so as to affect in anywise their interests contrary to the Constitution of the United States; but I say now, as I said then, that I consider the amendment simply and only as nugatory, having no effect whatever to affect the interests or the rights of the people of Colorado; and desiring the admission of that Territory into the Union as a State, and desiring it now, I propose, being responsible to my own sense of what is right and to my own conscience, not to the Senator from Wisconsin, to cast my vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator from West Virginia certainly misunderstood all that I said if he understood me to question at all the sincerity of his views or his conscientious convictions in voting upon this or any other bill. I never have entertained any such idea of the Senator from West Virginia. For his high moral sense and convictions of duty I have an exceedingly high respect, and always have entertained it. What I did say, substantially, was this: that I could not see how I could reconcile it, in my view of my duty, to the oath which I had taken, to vote for a proposition which I saw was unconstitutional, and then justify my vote upon the ground that by being unconstitutional it was simply nugatory and of no effect. I cannot reconcile that for myself. Other gentlemen, perhaps, may do so. I do not question the sincerity of their convictions, nor have I assumed to do so; but so far as my judgment is concerned, as it seems to me, in the line of my duty, having sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, I cannot vote for a proposition which I conceive to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States, although, because it is in violation of the Constitution, it is null and void, and amounts to nothing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not propose to go into any further argument on this subject with my friend from Oregon or with any other gentleman who is disposed to disagree with the views which I have advanced. Posterity will decide between them and me. The principles of liberty which the amendment contains, I think, will have some little growth out of this bill. It is now, having been adopted, as they suppose, the body of Moses to us all. I am not disposed to bring against them any railing accusation, but to leave another tribunal to administer the necessary rebuke.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. GRIMES and Mr. JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fowler, Henderson, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, and Riddle—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Fogg, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Harris, Howe, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—18.

So the bill was passed.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. WADE. I move now to take up House bill No. 508. It relates to this same subject, and I want to get through with it as quick as I can.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is that?

Mr. WADE. It is a bill to prevent hereafter any distinction on account of color in any of the Territories belonging to the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will be debated.

Mr. SUMNER. Oh no, I think not. Let us pass it through now. Let us crown what we have done to-day with this.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 508) to amend the organic acts of the Territories of Nebraska, Colorado, Dakota, Montana, Washington, Idaho, Arizona, Utah, and New Mexico.

Mr. WADE. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment pending to the bill, which will be read.

Mr. WADE. Would it not be in order to amend by striking out the whole bill and the pending amendment and inserting this substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. While the present amendment is pending, the motion of the Senator from Ohio would not be in order. It will be in order immediately after disposing of the amendment now pending, which is to strike out the [ninth] third section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. [9] 3. And be it further enacted, That within the Territories aforesaid there shall be no denial of the elective franchise to citizens of the United States because of race or color, and all persons shall be equal before the law. And all acts or parts of acts, either of Congress or of the Legislative Assemblies of the Territories aforesaid, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby declared null and void.

Mr. SUMNER. Let that be stricken out.

Mr. WADE. Very well; let it be struck out, then.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. Now I move to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert the following:

That in all the Territories of the United States there shall be no denial to citizens of the United States of the elective franchise by reason of race or color, and all persons shall be equal before the law. And all acts or parts of acts, either of Congress or of the Legislative Assembly of any Territory, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby declared null and void.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object to hurrying this bill through without any consideration. It seems to be a new proposition, and there is some phraseology employed that may be more comprehensive than Senators suppose. In all the Territories, according to this proposed amendment, all persons are to be equal before the law. I should like to know what that means before I vote to incorporate into the organic acts of the Territories such phraseology as that. What is the precise meaning and effect of it? Suppose an Indian should insist upon the right to sit upon a jury. He is authorized to do so, and his right cannot be denied by that amendment. All persons are to be equal before the law, without distinction of race or color or sex, according to that amendment. I wish Senators to remember that in the Territories there is a very large population of wild, untamed Indians, and in attempting to provide for the black race within the States I think Senators ought not to use language that will put those Indians in the Territories who are wholly unfit to perform any of the duties of a citizen, who are wholly unable to perform any of the duties of a citizen, on an equal footing, and entitle them to all the rights and privileges which the white people of the Territories enjoy.

Mr. WADE. That is not the intention. Does not the amendment use the word "citizen?" I believe it does.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; it says "all persons shall be equal before the law;" and I think that such phraseology as that in legislation is exceedingly dangerous. Specify what particular rights you intend the people of the Territories should possess. If you will say that the citizens of the Territories shall have the right to vote, then I will agree to the proposition.

Mr. WADE. I am willing to restrict it in that way. That is what it means.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or if you desire that they shall have any other rights, and you specify them, then I can understand for what I vote; but to use that sort of phraseology, that "all persons shall be equal before the law," when there are so many ramifications of government and society to which the language applies, seems to me to be a dangerous mode of legislation. I hope this amendment will not be adopted in this hasty manner.

Mr. LANE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 9, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a question of privilege, but as several gentlemen wish to submit a few matters by unanimous consent I will yield for that purpose.

PAY OF A MEMBER.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Hon. D. W. Gooch the amount of increased pay of a member of this House provided by law, from the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the date of his resignation.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TOWN OF SHASTA.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill respecting the town of Shasta, California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and, together with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to restore the jurisdiction of Indian affairs to the Department of War; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FREE SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WELKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide a system of education for the public schools of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the committee on free schools in the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

COMPENSATION OF LIGHT-HOUSE KEEPERS.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving increased compensation to keepers of light-houses and light-vessels in the United States, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

HARBOR OF NEW YORK.

Mr. DODGE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform this House if any and what steps have been taken for removing the wreck of the steamer Scotland, recently sunk in the entrance of the channel of the harbor of New York, and what is necessary in order to secure the early removal of the wreck, which is endangering the navigation of the channel.

HOMESTEADS FOR COLORED MEN.

Mr. GRINNELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which, being a call for executive information, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inquire whether any modification of the third article of the treaty with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, ratified June 23, 1866, can be made whereby the eight thousand persons of color now without homesteads may have their status as citizens defined, and they be allowed at an early day to select homesteads from the unoccupied lands.

TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANK SHARES.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which, being a call for executive information, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether so much of the forty-first section of the act concerning banking associations as limits the right of State authority to tax shares of such associations at the place where the bank is located, ought not to be so amended as to permit the taxation of the shares in any town where owned in the State where the bank is located instead of at the place of said bank, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

MICHAEL McCANN.

Mr. BROOMALL, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to furnish to the House of Representatives all written agreements, contracts, and papers, or copies thereof, relating to the claim of Michael McCann against the Government for the services of the barge Charles Warner, with a statement of the amount of money paid and the amount yet due according to the contract, and of whatever action may have been had upon the account by the proper auditor.

LAND OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. LATHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House thirty thousand extra copies of the last report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

CLAIMS OF LOYAL TENNESSEANS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a resolution passed by the House on the 18th of January, 1866, in the substance following: "That until otherwise ordered the Committee of Claims be instructed to reject all claims referred to them for examination by citizens of any of the States lately in rebellion," &c., be, and the same is, so modified as not to embrace any claims presented by loyal citizens of Tennessee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

NAVAL BOUNTIES.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending an act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, approved July 28, 1866, as will allow seamen and marines of the Navy, under the same limitations and restrictions, the bounty allowed by said act to soldiers, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has the morning hour commenced?

The SPEAKER. It has not. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] is upon the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I hope we shall dispose of his question of privilege.

THE INCOME TAX.

Mr. CULLOM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the revenue laws that incomes to the extent of $1,000 shall be exempt from taxation, and that all incomes above that amount shall be taxed five per cent. and no more.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now insist on the regular order.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, I hold that a vote given in this House by a member of this body is one of the most important acts that a member can possibly perform; and the record of that vote I hold to be a matter of the first importance. And I rise to ascertain from the Speaker the position held upon this floor by the reporters of the Associated Press; if they are officers of this House under the resolution which admitted them to this floor, or whether they are not. If they be officers of this House, I hold that the Journal, the record of the proceedings of this House, is the only standard whereby they can publish to the press of the country the votes given upon this floor. Have the reporters of the Associated Press the right, by changing the record of this House and interpolating their opinion relative to a vote here given, thereby to change the position of a member of this body, so far as their act can do it? That is the question. Now, sir, the special instance in regard to which I rise is the record of the vote taken on the resolution of impeachment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call the gentleman to order. I want to know whether this is a question of privilege or not.

Mr. CHANLER. I wish to know whether it is or is not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is stating his question of privilege.

Mr. CHANLER. I wish to know if the privilege of a member of this House includes the record of his vote as published by the reporters of the Associated Press, who are upon this floor by the permission of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If it is in the nature of a personal explanation then I do not object.

Mr. CHANLER. It is in the nature of a personal explanation, but involves a question of privilege.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then it is not in the nature of a question of privilege?

Mr. CHANLER. It includes a question of privilege also in my opinion, and I wish to have my full privileges here upon a matter of personal explanation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman asks for that I shall not object.

Mr. CHANLER. I have put the question, and I believe the Chair understands it. Now I wish to leave the question there. If it be within the privileges of this House, I will now go on with the personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the question involved was a correction of the Journal of the House, then it would be a question of privilege. The Chair has examined the Journal of the House and finds the gentleman's name recorded in the affirmative, upon the passage of the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] in regard to impeachment. The Journal, therefore, is correct.

The Chair will answer the other question of the gentleman, in regard to the position of the reporters of this House. The reporters of the Globe have been regarded as officers of this House. They have been so recognized in various ways, in appropriation bills, &c. The reporters of the two associated presses, by a vote of this House, have been granted seats upon the floor instead of in the reporters' gallery, that they may be able to give more elaborate reports, by means of access to the records of the House and to documents they may have occasion to copy. In the opinion of the Chair, the reporters of the associated presses are not officers of the House.

As to any statement in reference to the action of the gentleman not being correctly stated by the reporters, that is a question for the gentleman and the House to determine. If the gentleman claims that he has been intentionally misrepresented, then it is a question which he can bring before the House for their action.

Mr. CHANLER. Does the Chair rule that a misrepresentation of a vote given on this floor by a member is a question of privilege, or does he decide that it is not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not regard it as a question of privilege, which the gentleman would have a right to present to this House for its action, overruling all other questions, as questions of privilege always do, unless he presents it for the action of the House as the Chair has just indicated. A question of privilege generally refers to the right of a member to his seat, and questions arising therefrom. A correction of the Journal, being a record of the votes and action of members here, is always regarded as a question of privilege. Corrections of reports in the Globe have not been regarded as questions of privilege, but have always been entertained by Speakers who have preceded the present occupant of the chair that these reports may be as correct as possible.

In regard to any misstatements which may have been made by other reporters, they have not been regarded as questions of privilege unless the member interested states that he has been intentionally defamed by the reporter, and therefore desires action of the House to protect himself.

Mr. CHANLER. Then I will first ask to be heard as a question of privilege, upon a misrepresentation in the Globe of a vote given by myself in this House.* My vote upon the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] is misrepresented in the report published in the Globe. That misrepresentation I understand came from the suggestion of a reporter of the Associated Press, who undertook to direct the reporters of the Globe. Now you can change it and divide it and refine it as you please; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] may seek to prevent me from having my rights upon this floor; but I claim that under the practices of this House I am speaking here upon a question of privilege.

Now, sir, all that I ask is that as the reporters of the associated presses have been courteously admitted to seats upon this floor by a vote of this House, their position here shall be defined. And also if the reporters of the Globe are under the influence and direction of the Associated Press reporters, they shall be put in the same category, either for good or for evil; and that the reporters of the associated presses shall hold themselves strictly bound by the Journal and official records of the proceedings of this House made by the clerks of this body. That is all I ask. I protest against any proceeding by which a member can have the record of his vote changed and misrepresented by any person who is admitted to the privileges of the floor of this House.

And with all due deference to the Chair, I look upon it as a strange ruling which allows a reporter, admitted by courtesy to this floor, to state, as is stated in the paper which I hold in my hand, [the New York Herald,] the result of a vote, excluding by his report a member of this body from appearing as voting at all upon this floor. By the statement which the Clerk will read I am excluded by the reporter for the Associated Press from a vote given in this body.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not have been as clear as he supposed he was in his statement; for certainly the gentleman has misunderstood that statement. The Chair has stated that the gentleman has the right to ask the action of the House against any reporter who he thinks has intentionally misrepresented him.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not put it on that ground. I put it on the ground of an error. I do not wish to enter into any controversy whether the reporter on this floor meant or did not mean to misrepresent me. I wish to hold the reporter strictly to the record of the Journal of this House. He has no option in the matter. He cannot at his own option go outside of the record and state as a fact that which is not a fact. I am not going into an examination of his intentions, nor do I wish to do so. I believe that this misrepresentation arose from an error; I am willing to admit it. I make no charges against him on the question of intention.

The SPEAKER. What action does the gentleman desire from the Chair?

Mr. CHANLER. I wish the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has expressed himself as not satisfied with the decision of the Chair. What action does he desire from the Chair?

Mr. CHANLER. I wish to offer a resolution to the effect that the reporters for the press on this floor shall be subject to the same rules as the reporters of the Globe.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the newspaper extract which the gentleman has sent up.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution. The vote was taken by yeas and nays and resulted—yeas 107, nays 39. It was announced as 108 to 38; but as the official list showed Mr. CHANLER voting in the affirmative, and as that was evidently a mistake, the transfer of his vote to the negative makes the first figures the correct ones."

[Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. I wish to call attention to the further fact that in the list of yeas and nays, as contained in the paper from which the Clerk has read, my name is omitted.

Now, sir, I do not wish to be considered as having made any mistake. I voted on due consideration and with a fixed determination. I voted for the purpose of bringing before this body a full statement of the facts relative to the charges made against the first Magistrate of the country. I wish to be understood here and everywhere as being neither the friend nor the foe of that Chief Magistrate. As a representative of the people, I feel that when there are preferred in this House charges of the importance of those presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] against the President of the United States, it is the duty of each member here to favor and insist upon a full investigation. Even if I were the champion of the Chief Magistrate of the nation I should have insisted upon an examination as a matter concerning his honor. When suspicious rest upon him, when grave charges are urged against him, how can his fitness and capacity for the position which he holds be demonstrated except by the constitutional method of examination? That method being proposed here, I am willing to accept it as proposed in good faith.

I have no political sympathy with the gentleman who introduced that resolution; but I assert that the vote given by me on that occasion was no mistake. It was the result of mature judgment. I acted upon what I deem to be a very sound principle. Whether the President of the United States be innocent or guilty of the crimes and high misdemeanors charged upon him in the resolution is a question for determination in the future; and the grand jury of the nation, when it refuses to initiate an indictment against a person subjected to such charges, does not, in my opinion, fulfill its duty. Without regard to any political combinations or partisan purposes, I stand here ready to initiate an examination into the conduct of any officer of the Government who may be charged in good faith with impeachable offenses. I am ready to push the investigation to the highest tribunal we recognize here to punish crimes and high misdemeanors, such as are charged against the President.

Now, sir, I desire that other members of this House may not be subjected in the future to such mistakes as that of which I have in the present case been the victim. My object, in presenting this question of privilege, as I believe it to be, has been to bring the matter to the knowledge of the House and elicit an investigation. I desired to obtain from the Presiding Officer of the House a statement of the exact position in which the Associated Press, by their reporters, stand here. I therefore move that the reporters for the Associated Press, admitted to seats on this floor, be under the same rules and regulations as the reporters for the Globe; that all questions of privilege arising in regard to the alteration of votes made in the records of the Associated Press be under the same rule as that which regulates reports in the Globe.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it up in writing and the Clerk will read it.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Rules.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the reporters of the Associated Press be under the same rules and regulations as reporters of the Globe.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York will turn to page 157 of Barclay's Digest he will see, in corroboration of what the Chair decided, that it is declared to be a question of privilege if a false and scandalous report of proceedings in the House be made by any of its reporters. If a gentleman alleges a reporter has intentionally and falsely misrepresented him, it will be a question of privilege. If an error has been made unintentionally, as in this case, the Chair doubts whether it would be a question of privilege.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not charge it was intentional.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CHANLER. I modify it so as to say, "reporters and reports made by them."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not understand the gentleman charges that the official reporters of the Globe have made any intentional mistake.

* The misrepresentation complained of by Mr. CHANLER appeared in the Daily Globe of January 8, but the correction was made for this edition. See page 321.

Mr. CHANLER. I have specially denied making any such charge. My object in rising was to bring in this resolution.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Rules.

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION OF CLERKS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be a motion to postpone previous orders to take up House joint resolution No. 224, giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask whether the joint resolution as it is intended to be presented has been printed?

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee have only one or two amendments to propose to the printed bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a point of order. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it is competent for the House to assign the consideration of this joint resolution immediately after the morning hour? I want the House to have a morning hour this morning.

The SPEAKER. It can by unanimous consent only, as there are special orders anterior to this one in date which came in after the morning hour. But, if taken up, the House can then, by a majority vote, postpone it till any other hour of the day.

Mr. COBB. Is this the same joint resolution introduced by the gentleman from Ohio and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is the joint resolution which I reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a few days ago. It was set for yesterday. I hope it will be taken up and passed as it will take but a few moments.

Mr. ALLEY. When the proposition was made I asked whether it would interfere with the morning hour, and I was told it would not, otherwise I should have objected.

Mr. GARFIELD. If taken up yesterday it would not have interfered with the morning hour.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman consent, if the joint resolution be taken up, to have it postponed until after the morning hour?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not want to interfere with the morning hour.

The joint resolution was taken up and then postponed till after the morning hour.

CALIFORNIA MAILS.

The first business in order during the morning hour was the call of committees for reports.

Mr. ALLEY. I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report a joint resolution directing the Postmaster General to adjust and settle the claim of the ocean steamship line running between New York and San Francisco, via Panama, and to allow such sum as in his judgment shall be equitable and just for extra mail service performed by said steamship company during the interruption of the overland service by Indian hostilities in 1864 and 1865, provided the allowance shall not exceed $10,300; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed there is no report.

Mr. ALLEY. There is no report. I will state the circumstances of the case. This service was performed by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company during the interruption of the overland service, occasioned by Indian hostilities, in 1864. The claim which the company made on the Government was $50,000. The then Postmaster General recommended to Congress to pay the sum of $22,000, I think. The committee, feeling that that was too much, based their estimate of the amount of pay for the service upon the price which was charged for first-class freight, inasmuch as the company were not required to do anything extra, and inasmuch as the company would have been willing to have performed the same service for any individual or corporation at that rate. The committee were of the opinion that the Government should be called upon to pay no more for service rendered than for the same service rendered to individuals, and upon that basis it was found that the sum should be $10,300. Upon conference with the Postmaster General he concurred with the committee in the opinion that that was the right basis on which to settle the claim.

I am not advised whether the company will accept the proposition or not, but the committee are clearly of the opinion after a full investigation of the case that the sum proposed is sufficient, and they are unanimous I believe in reporting that this sum at least should be paid. Some of the committee were of the opinion that a larger sum should be paid for the service, but the majority thought otherwise, and all thought that this sum was the smallest that should be allowed. Therefore, I suppose there can be no objection to it, and I will call the previous question if no further explanation is desired.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think there will be some little objection to this bill as it now stands. I do not know much about this matter. It involves an appropriation of $10,000, but from the statement of the gentleman, if I understood it, there is no just claim whatever. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company are obliged under their contract to perform the mail service, and the complaint is now that they were compelled to do a little more than they were willing to do, and so they come back here and ask the modest sum of $50,000 to do what they were obliged to do for nothing, and they have finally cut down their claim to $10,000; and now the gentleman proposes to pay this sum and to gag the bill through under the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois whether it will not be cheaper to pay this $10,000 than to be called upon to pay this claim several years hence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am not responsible for the future, only for the present.

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman from Illinois is famous for talking about gagging in this House under the previous question. Mr. Speaker, I stated only the facts in the case; and allow me to say that the gentleman from Illinois has shown by his remarks that he knows nothing whatever of the merits of the case or the contract under which the company were acting. I will only say further that I stated to the House most distinctly that if any further questions were asked of the chairman of the committee I would cheerfully answer them, and that I would give any gentleman an opportunity to make any remarks he chose; but if no further questions were to be asked, and no further remarks to be made, I should call the previous question. Under those circumstances I thought it rather ungenerous that the gentleman from Illinois should make the remarks he did. I will now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. I ask to have the joint resolution read. I have a suggestion to make, unless I find it unnecessary after hearing the joint resolution read.

The joint resolution was accordingly read.

Mr. KASSON. I will say that upon the facts as I understood the provisions of this joint resolution, the limitation which I feared was not in it will probably tend to accomplish the object sought. I recollect that in the contract that was made this company for a certain sum, I think $160,000, were obliged to carry the printed mail matter, and that they made the contract for about $10,000 less, or about $150,000. The company, however, were obliged also to carry such letters as should be marked to go by that route. That did not contemplate the transfer of the entire letter mail by that route to California. Owing to the interruption by the Indians of the overland service they were obliged to take the entire letter mail, including all those letters, a majority of which were not directed to go by the steamer route to California. From an examination which I made of this matter some days ago, I admit that we ought to limit the appropriation substantially to the amount originally authorized by Congress to be paid for the transportation of printed matter to California, and this joint resolution so limits it: it provides that they shall be paid in accordance with an equitable adjustment made by the Department, against the remonstrance of the company carrying the mails.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is one consideration which I think is worthy of the attention of this House. This joint resolution for the appropriation of this $10,000 is not accompanied by any written report whatever. We have only the statement of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY,] who reported the joint resolution. It is simply his statement. There is nothing to go upon the records or files of the House to show upon what grounds we voted this money. And the gentleman did ask the previous question, but he afterward gave way.

In regard to that, let me say that perhaps I spoke a little hastily, but I did not forget that at the last session of Congress the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] brought forward a proposition here which inflicted the greatest injury on my constituents and the eight million people of the Northwest in the interest of a railroad company to dam up the Mississippi river, and he called the previous question on that measure and endeavored to shut off all discussion.

Mr. ALLEY. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is that the gentleman is not discussing the question now before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Was the gentleman from Massachusetts discussing the question before the House when he administered his rebuke to me?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois did not raise the question of order on the gentleman from Massachusetts, or the Chair would have ruled as he now does. The gentleman from Illinois must confine himself to the joint resolution before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish the gentleman from Massachusetts had confined his remarks to the pending resolution. There are some things which the gentleman says that I do not understand. I wish, before I am compelled to vote upon this question, to know what the contract is with this Pacific Mail Steamship Company. I wish to have the contract here so that I may judge for myself whether they have any claim on us or not. I want to know whether there was not an obligation on the part of this company which has drawn from the Treasury nearly two hundred thousand dollars a year to carry the letter mail.

I understand from the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that there was a temporary interruption of the overland mail, which only carries letters, and this steamship company was compelled for a few months to carry the letters which otherwise would have gone overland; and for that service, which on the face of their contract they were compelled to perform, they come here and ask for this appropriation, which is to be disbursed by the Postmaster General.

Sir, I am opposed to this kind of legislation, to this giving away of the authority we have ourselves into the hands of somebody else. I will not say anything against the Postmaster General. I believe he would adjust this matter fairly and honestly; but I do not propose to trust this power to him, to abdicate the powers which we have ourselves and give them into the hands of this man. Let the gentleman ask to recommit his resolution, and make a full written report showing all the circumstances, so that we may know what claim this steamship company has and act upon it intelligently.

Mr. KASSON. Let me state one other fact. The principle upon which this examination, which resulted in the proposed allowance of $10,300, was made was this: the Post Office Department in effecting this proposed adjustment, or in the negotiations for it—for it is not yet an adjustment—took the weight of the letter mail as compared with the weight of the printed matter carried by this company; and this resolution only proposes to allow them a pro rata compensation by weight for carrying the letter mail.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] state to the House what are the terms of the contract, whether or not this steamship company were not bound by the very terms of the contract to carry all the mail matter that the Department may choose to send by them?

Mr. KASSON. I have not the contract here, but will state my recollection of its provisions. This steamship company agreed to carry all the printed mail matter that should be sent by the Department by the sea route; they also agreed to carry all letters that should have written upon the envelopes a direction for them to be carried by the sea route instead of by the overland route. In point of fact it was expected that the most of the letters would go by the overland route, as being the shorter and quicker route; but the doubts which were raised about the safety of the overland route induced many merchants and others to desire to have their letters go by the sea route, although it would require more days in their transmission. When the overland route was entirely interrupted, in consequence of Indian troubles, the Department sent all the letters by the sea route. In consequence of that the company claims a large sum, several times the amount proposed here. The Department insist that if any sum is paid it should be only in proportion to the weight of the letters as compared with the weight of the printed matter carried by the company. If such an adjustment can be adhered to, I think it would be a very favorable one for the Department.

I would call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] to the only defect in his bill, if I understood it correctly when it was read. I think it does not provide that this sum, if paid, shall be in full satisfaction of the claim of this steamship company for this service.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to ask the gentleman, as he was formerly connected with the Post Office Department, whether the terms of the contract do not require that this company shall perform such occasional additional service as the exigencies of the Department might require? I was connected with the Committee on Private Claims in former Congresses, and I remember that we had a great many claims brought before us by mail contractors for some extra service they had performed, occasioned by reason of low water or some other temporary cause; but, as I recollect, the Department had in their contracts guarded against any such demands for extra compensation in such cases.

Mr. KASSON. The general practice of the Department has been as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has stated. But this was an exceptional contract. Originally the overland mail was to take all matter printed and written; but it was discovered that often the drivers of the mail stages, when they got into any very bad place, were in the habit of taking the printed mail matter and use it to fill up the holes and sloughs over which they had to pass, so as to furnish a means for their teams to transport the stages across. In consequence of that the Department made provision for relieving the overland route from this great amount of printed mail matter, consisting mostly of public documents, &c., which lumbered the coaches exceedingly. I do not speak now of the policy of thus relieving them from that portion of the contract, but it was so done.

They arranged to have the entire printed mail matter, except such as was to be distributed along the route, sent by sea; and in that case an exceptional contract was made in reference to printed mail matter.

Mr. ALLEY. If it is in order, to meet the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] I will move to amend by adding the following:

And provided further, That this shall be accepted by said company as full satisfaction for all claims against the Government for this service.

The facts have been stated correctly by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] There is no report, and the contract is not here. But the House will bear me witness that it has been the custom of committees frequently to report bills and joint resolutions without written reports to accompany them. This joint resolution was considered one where it was not necessary to have a report accompanying it. The facts are as stated; and the company would, by a pro rata estimate, be entitled to $50,000 or more for the services rendered; and it is the opinion, as I know, of some of the best lawyers in the country that they can claim and recover that sum. But upon the principles of equity and justice I believed, as did the Postmaster General, as well as nearly all the members of the committee, that the company were not entitled to more than $10,300. The company regard this as a mere bagatelle, and feel great dissatisfaction with the award of the committee and of the Department. But be that as it may, we all felt, without a dissenting voice, after a full investigation of all the facts, that the company were entitled to at least $10,300. Nobody disputed that; but there was a difference of opinion in the committee, and there is a difference of opinion in other quarters, with regard to the amount, the company believing themselves entitled (as well as many others) to a much greater amount than the one awarded by the committee. Certainly it seems to me that no honest person can, in view of the facts of the case, deny the justice of awarding the company at least $10,300. With this explanation I call for the previous question.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move that the bill and pending amendments be laid on the table.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Would it be in order now, Mr. Speaker, to move to refer the bill to the Committee of Claims?

The SPEAKER. It would not be. Two undebatable motions are now pending.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, there were—ayes 45, noes 46; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, and Mr. ALLEY.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 34.

So the motion to lay the bill and pending amendments on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 454) for the relief of the widow of Jacob Harmon;

An act (S. No. 455) for the relief of the widow of Henry Fry; and

An act (S. No. 476) for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, deceased.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a joint resolution to procure a site for a building to accommodate the post office and United States courts in New York city; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read at length, provides that the mayor and postmaster of the city of New York, the district attorney for the United States at New York city, the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, and Jackson S. Schultz, Charles H. Russell, and Moses Taylor, of New York city, shall be appointed a commission to purchase the site for a building to accommodate the post office and United States courts in the city of New York, in accordance with their report submitted to the Secretary of the Interior and the Postmaster General, and by them approved, namely: the lower portion of the City Hall park, containing land equal to twenty-six city lots, or over ninety-six thousand square feet; and that they be authorized to purchase the same for the sum of $500,000, subject to the condition that the Government of the United States shall stipulate that it shall be used for public purposes only; and that the commission procure plans and estimates for a suitable building upon the site, to be submitted to the Postmaster General and Secretary of the Interior, who, if the plans and estimates meet their approval, are to communicate them to Congress with such additional suggestions as they may think proper; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay, out of money hereafter to be appropriated, such sum as may be necessary to carry this resolution into effect.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, it will be recollected by the House that at the last session this commission was appointed to select a site for a new post office and court-house in the city of New York. From that time to this the gentlemen composing the commission have been engaged in endeavoring to procure a suitable site. They have succeeded in having placed at the disposal of the Government for this purpose some twenty-six lots at the lower end of the park, containing some sixty-six thousand square feet. The city of New York proposes to sell to the Government this property for $500,000, to be used for the purposes of the post office and courts of the United States. This is a very small sum in comparison with the real value of the property. I have conversed with gentlemen well qualified to determine the value of such property, and they say that upon a fair estimate it is worth at least $4,000,000. One gentleman upon this floor, who is known to be possessed not only of excellent judgment, but amply able to back up pecuniarily whatever he says, declared to me that he would give $3,000,000 for this property which the city of New York proposes to sell to the Government for $500,000.

This commission, as all are aware, is composed of some of the most high-minded gentlemen of the city of New York, all of whom have the entire confidence of the whole community. These gentlemen propose, in case the Government should desire to make this purchase and to erect this building, to serve until it is completed gratuitously. And if gentlemen observed the names, as read, they will recognize the fact that they furnish a sufficient guaranty that the work will be done in the most expeditious and economical manner, without charge and without a fat job to anybody.

This joint resolution does not propose, as was recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and the Postmaster General, to appropriate $1,500,000 to erect the building. In the opinion of the committee it was thought best to authorize this commission to procure estimates and plans and to submit them for the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Postmaster General, and by them to be communicated to Congress, when such appropriation could be made as the facts merit and estimates might justify. The committee thought it best to go no further than to recommend the purchase of the site, and that the commission should be continued to procure estimates and plans.

Mr. RAYMOND. I desire merely to inquire whether the report of this commission, called for by the resolution under which they were appointed, accompanies the joint resolution.

Mr. ALLEY. The report was sent to the House yesterday and ordered to be printed, and was placed in my hands.

Mr. RAYMOND. I ask that the papers be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 8, 1867.

SIR: Congress, by joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution relative to the courts and post office of New York city," approved May 16, 1866, appointed a commission to select a proper site for a building for a post office and for the accommodation of the United States courts in the city of New York.

The commission has selected a site and reported to the undersigned the price at which it can be purchased.

We approve the report, and we have the honor to communicate it to Congress.

The facts and considerations submitted in the report are, in our opinion, conclusive as to the expediency of purchasing, on the terms proposed, the site selected. We respectfully recommend an additional appropriation of $1,500,000 for the erection of a building for the purpose mentioned in the joint resolution. An urgent necessity exists for early action, and we are of opinion that economy and policy require that the United States should be the proprietor of the building in the city of New York appropriated to such important public uses.

We have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servants.

O. H. BROWNING.

Secretary of the Interior.

ST. JOHN B. L. SKINNER.

Acting Postmaster General.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

To Hon. ALEXANDER W. RANDALL, Postmaster General, and Hon. O. H. BROWNING, Secretary of the Interior:

The undersigned, having been by resolution of Congress, approved May 16, 1866, appointed a commission to select a proper site for a building for a post office and for the accommodation of the United States courts in the city of New York, report: A full and free interchange of views was had at several of their meetings, and it was agreed that the first thing to be determined was the size of a building necessary to meet the requirements of the business of the United States courts and those of the postal business of the city of New York during the next thirty years. Upon investigation it was ascertained that the average amount of outgoing and incoming mails had increased in less than twelve years from ten tons per day to ninety and one hundred tons per day; that the business in every department of the city post office had more than doubled during the last four years; that the present post office building was totally unfit for and inadequate to the present wants of the postal business, and that a building fitted to accommodate it and the business of the United States courts would require a space of land equal to from twenty-five to thirty city lots.

It was also apparent that a location should be procured in which streets were wider than those upon which the present post office is situated, the latter being too narrow to permit large mail-wagons to be turned in them without using the sidewalks on one of the sides of those streets. Advertisements, therefore, were inserted daily for two weeks in four papers of the largest circulation inviting proposals for the sale of a space of land equal to twenty-five or thirty city lots, centrally located in the city of New York. Only one definite response was received, namely, from Smith Cliff, Esq., relative to the sale of St. John's park. This property, located near the Hudson river, was considered to be so far removed from the central part of the city as to be unfit for the purposes proposed. The Legislature of the State of New York having in the year 1860, and again in the year 1861, authorized the corporation of the city of New York to sell to the United States a portion of the City Hall park on which to erect a post office, both boards of the common council appointed a joint committee to meet a committee of this commission and a committee of the commissioners of the sinking fund, (without whose consent a sale of real property by the city of New York could not be made,) to take into consideration the terms upon which a sufficient space of the City Hall park for the purposes designed could be sold to the United States. Their meetings resulted in the passage, by the commissioners of the sinking fund, of a resolution that the city of New York should sell to the United States a space in the lower part of the City Hall park, bounded and described as follows:

All that piece or parcel of land in the city of New York, being the southerly end of the City Hall park in said city, bounded and containing as follows: commencing on the easterly line of Broadway at a point three hundred feet northerly from the westerly termination of the curved line which bounds the southern extremity of the said City Hall park, and running thence southerly along the said easterly line of Broadway three hundred feet to the said westerly termination of the said curved line; thence following the said curved line one hundred and fifty feet to its easterly termination on the westerly line of Park row; thence along the said westerly line of Park row three hundred feet; thence in a straight line across the said City Hall park three hundred and twenty feet and two inches to the point of beginning; containing in area sixty-five thousand two hundred and fifty-nine square feet, for the sum of $500,000, with a condition that the property should revert to the city whenever the United States ceased to use it for the purpose for which it was sold. The joint committee of the common council unanimously recommended to their several boards the adoption of this resolution. A resolution in accordance therewith has been adopted by both boards of common council, and the same has been duly approved by the mayor. (A copy of the resolution is hereto annexed.)

Your commission deem it proper to state that the municipal authorities of the city of New York have, in adopting the resolution above referred to, (by which so large a portion of the City Hall park will be at a mere nominal price, if accepted by the United States,) exhibited great liberality, and shown a commendable disposition to aid the Government in this important and necessary improvement. Your commission also refer to a communication from Samuel G. Courtney, Esq., United States district attorney, hereto annexed, in which he states the number of rooms that will be required for the use of the United States courts and the offices necessary to transact the large and increasing judicial business of the district. It is the opinion of this commission that the accommodations named in the communication of the district attorney could not be procured in any location in the city of New York, central and suitable, at a rental of less than $75,000 per annum.

It is not, perhaps, improper for this commission to refer to some of the advantages that would be secured by the United States in the purchase of this property. The price named is a mere nominal sum. The space specified is equal to about twenty-six city lots. It is well located for the purpose and business of the United States courts, being in the immediate vicinity of the City Hall, new City Hall, the custom-house, and other public buildings of the United States. The Government is now paying $22,500 rent per annum for the premises at present occupied by the United States courts and the offices connected therewith, and which are entirely unfit and inadequate for the purposes for which they are used; and this purchase for the use of the courts alone would be a good investment. It is also the focal point of all the city travel. Nearly all the railroads in and running into the city of New York terminate at this point or in its immediate vicinity.

No other site suitable or adequate for the purposes aforesaid having been presented or offered to the undersigned, this commission therefore recommend that the United States accept the offer of the corporation of the city of New York to sell to it the portion of the City Hall park referred to in the resolution hereto annexed for the purpose of erecting thereon a city post office and rooms for the courts of the United States, and for the necessary offices connected therewith; and in conclusion, we would suggest that the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Interior urge upon Congress at its present session such action as will insure the purchase of the site above mentioned, and also the erection at once of the buildings so long and so greatly needed.

Mayor of New York.

United States Attorney, southern district New York.

Resolutions referred to in foregoing report.

Resolved, That the mayor, aldermen and commonality of the city of New York, do hereby authorize and direct a conveyance to the United States Government of a piece of ground described in a resolution, adopted by the commissioners of the sinking fund, on the 26th day of June, 1866, upon the terms described in said resolution, which resolution read as follows:

"Resolved, That the commissioners of the sinking fund advise that the lower portion of the City Hall park, as designated on a certain map, which constitutes a portion of the records of the proceedings of said commissioners, be sold and conveyed to the United States Government as a site or location for a post office and court-house, and to be used by the said United States Government for said purposes exclusively, for the sum of $500,000, the conveyance to contain a provision that when the same shall cease to be used for the purposes specified, or for some one of them, the title shall revert to and be reinvested in the mayor, aldermen, and commonality of the city of New York."

Copy of Communication from S. G. Courtney, Esq., United States District Attorney.

The judicial branch of the public service will require apartments as follows: Room for the United States district attorney; room for the United States marshal; room for the United States circuit clerk; room for the United States district clerk; room for the United States circuit clerk's office; room for the United States grand jury; private chambers for judges United States district court; private chambers for judges United States circuit court; two rooms for referees of circuit and district courts; one room for storage for the United States marshal.

District Attorney.—This officer should be awarded at least six separate apartments. One large, commodious apartment for the district attorney; one for his chief assistant; one for the two remaining assistants; one for the clerks in charge of the registers; one for the copyists and messengers; and one specially given to the records of the office. These apartments should all connect with each other, so that the district attorney can conveniently at all times have his entire corps of subordinates within his control and supervision; and yet these apartments should be so separated (by partition and doorway) that each official may discharge his duties without interruption. If, in addition to those rooms, the district attorney may have an ante-room connected with his own for his private interviews, which in the course of business is often necessary, it would make the arrangements complete. An apartment, as suggested, for the records of the office, which have become voluminous, is indispensable. It is desirable that these rooms should be on the same floor or contiguous to the court-rooms.

United States Marshal's Office, jury-room, and storage for articles under seizure of the Marshal.—The rooms required for the accommodation of the United States marshal for the southern district of New York, his assistants, &c. One large room, say about twenty by forty, for the general business of the United States marshal's department, fitted up similar to banking institutions, to be occupied by the deputy and clerks; one room, smaller, for the use of the United States marshal as a private office; one room for ten constables attached to the marshal's department, large enough to be fitted up with a desk for each officer, and connected with or near the general office; one room for grand juries; one room for petit juries; both should be near the court-rooms; one room to keep prisoners and witnesses during examinations before United States commissioners and court trials; one large room for storage of goods, &c.; this room should be on the cellar floor. In addition to the above rooms, the usual accommodations for the janitor of the building.

United States Circuit Court.—Court-room, clerk's offices, and judge's chambers. The clerk of the circuit court will require, for the proper transaction of the business of his office, three rooms of good size for the accommodation of the clerk, deputy clerk, and under clerks in the office, and two rooms to be fitted up for the records. There should also be rooms provided for the circuit court and judge's chambers; would prefer to have them as near the ground floor as possible.

United States District Court.—Court-room, clerk's offices, and judge's chambers. The clerk of the United States district courts for the southern district will need in the new building, for the proper transaction of the business of his office, one room for the clerk; one room for the deputy clerk; three rooms for the under clerks and the books and papers in constant use; one very large room for the records and papers in suits that have been closed; one large room for the United States commissioners to hold their examinations in, as they are officers of court.

These rooms should connect with each other and should be on the same floor as the court-room. I desire particularly to press upon the committee the importance of expedition in the provision of accommodations as above described. The building now occupied by the judicial branch of the public service at No. 41 Chambers street has lately changed ownership, as I am credibly informed, and on the 1st of May next I presume new quarters for the transaction of the public business pertaining to the United States courts will be required. Where these quarters can now be obtained I am at a loss to say. It is very clear they must be had at whatever cost somewhere, and I mention the matter that the committee may know the urgency of the matters in their charge.

Respectfully, SAMUEL G. COURTNEY.

United States District Attorney.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will yield to me for a moment. I find no mention in this report in regard to the premises now occupied as a post office in the city of New York. I should like to have a plain understanding of this question. What is proposed to be done with that property? It is very valuable, and before acting on this joint resolution it should be known what we propose to do with that property.

Mr. ALLEY. I will say, for the information of the gentleman from New York, that the matter was before the committee, and it was thought best to recommend no action at the present time inasmuch as the property will have to be occupied until the new building is erected. It is supposed that that site will bring $350,000, which will go far toward the purchase of the other site. It was not thought advisable to dispose of it at the present time.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask whether in this transfer of property any contract, direct or implied, has been made to convey at any time the title to the property now occupied as a post office in the city of New York? I can well understand that this matter should not be delayed, but I should like to know before we take final action whether there is any understanding of any character whatever for a transfer or sale of the post office property in the city of New York.

Mr. ALLEY. I will answer the gentleman. There is no understanding, actual or implied, in reference to that whatever. I think the committee were unanimous that no action should be taken upon the subject whatever at present. It was stated incidentally that the property would bring $350,000.

Mr. CHANLER. I will state why I asked the question. It is currently understood the property now held as a post office is to be transferred to certain corporations, known as the Chamber of Commerce and Merchants' Exchange, for the erection of a suitable building for their convenience. Instead of this property being sold to the highest bidder and transferred, as it should be, to the advantage of this Government, it is likely to be passed over to certain parties who may or may not be directly interested in the present sale. I do not make any charge; I only say that I heard this directly from good authority.

Mr. ALLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I have got no information whatever from any source in regard to that fact except from the gentleman himself. He will recollect that he told me yesterday he had heard of such a rumor. I told him then that I had heard nothing of the kind, neither did I believe there was any such understanding. If there was, it certainly would not be carried into effect without a special act of Congress. Inasmuch as the Government owns the property, it cannot be transferred to any party except by special act of Congress, and in such manner as Congress shall direct. And it is not proposed by the committee or anybody else to take any action at present in reference to that matter.

Mr. DODGE. Mr. Speaker, this matter of a post office in the city of New York is one of national interest. It is not merely a post office for the accommodation of citizens of New York, but for the benefit of the entire country. The building now occupied is the old Dutch church transformed into a post office, and is one of the most inconvenient places for such a purpose that can possibly be conceived in a city of the magnitude of New York. The vast increase of business in that city demands that there should be a post office of a magnitude sufficient to do the business rapidly, conveniently, and economically in the city of New York.

Only a few years ago we had our mails from Europe once a month by steamers. When they came tri-monthly we felt that it was a great increase. We now have our steamers almost daily from various parts of Europe, and I noticed that on Saturday last there were twelve large steamships cleared from the city of New York, each of them carrying the mail. The mail matter within the last ten years in the city of New York has increased from thirty to one hundred tons daily.

The property now offered by the corporation of New York to the United States Government for a post office and for the United States courts, at the nominal sum of $500,000, would sell at public auction to-morrow for from three to five million dollars. It is an opportunity such as the Government can seldom obtain. It is the most feasible, the most eligible spot in the city of New York for a post office, and although there is great objection to using a portion of our public park for a post office, yet such is the necessity and such the desire to accommodate the United States Government that the corporation has yielded a plot of ground at the lower end of the public park equal to twenty-six lots for that purpose. It is such a favorable opportunity that I trust the House will see the importance of embracing it so as to secure a post office in the most convenient and eligible position at a mere nominal price.

Mr. ALLEY. If no other gentleman desires to say anything—

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to ask a question. I see by the resolution that the purpose is to make the mayor of the city of New York, the postmaster, and the district attorney members of this commission. I would like to know whether my colleague thinks it is a wise provision to appoint on this commission men wholly irresponsible except in the most indirect way.

Mr. ALLEY. I will say that a majority of the commission occupy official position, and the outsiders are well known to be of the very highest standing. This was the original commission, and it is but just to say that they have performed the duties gratuitously with entire satisfaction to all parties, and that upon this commission are certainly some as ardent Republicans as my colleague himself.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I must inform my colleague that when he names certain persons officially the designation does not necessarily indicate their politics. To leave a public interest in the hands of the mayor of the city of New York without knowing who he may be—I dare say the present mayor is a responsible man—is, in my opinion, very unwise. And if my colleague will allow me I will suggest still further, that if it is the intention to put the courts in this building, from what I know of New York I can conceive of no worse place than this. It may be well for the post office, but not for the United States court. It is the very worst place in the city of New York.

Mr. McRUER. I merely wish to say that this committee is authorized only to prepare and receive specifications and estimates and submit the matter to the approval of Congress.

Mr. ALLEY. In answer to my colleague [Mr. BOUTWELL] I will repeat the remark of my colleague on the committee, [Mr. McRUER,] that this resolution merely provides that this commission, which serves gratuitously and is composed of some of the best men in the country, shall procure a site and report to the Secretary of the Interior and the Postmaster General, who are to communicate the report, with such suggestions as they may deem proper, to Congress. That seems to me to be clothing them with very little power; not enough, certainly, to excite anybody's fears.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to have the names of the commission read.

The Clerk read the names, as follows: The mayor, the district attorney, the postmaster, the president of the Chamber of Commerce, Jackson S. Schultz, Charles H. Russell, and Moses Taylor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to add another name—a man I know to be an honest man in New York. I move to add the name of Charles H. Rogers.

Mr. RAYMOND. With regard to this commission, it seems to me that its importance is greatly overrated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] as well as by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] All the commission will have to do under this resolution will be to take, as a commission under this Government, a title from the city to this real estate. It has nothing whatever to do beyond that. When Congress is asked to make an appropriation for the erection of buildings it will then be quite competent for the gentleman from Illinois to furnish us, as I trust he may be able to do, with the names of honest men in New York to superintend that work. The names of these men were put in because it was thought fit and proper that official men, men having official responsibilities and holding official relations to the State of New York, should have something to say about the disposition of this question. I believe that no objection has been made to any one of these gentlemen, and that no suspicion ever has been cast on the integrity of any man included in the commission. Who may be the future mayor, or postmaster, or district attorney of New York depends upon circumstances over which we here can exercise no control.

I have no objection, certainly, to the gentleman named by the gentleman from Illinois; but I presume that each of us could name a man, if we desired to do so, who should have connection with this business. I see no sort of utility in his amendment, and no use in making any change in the bill as reported by the committee. An amendment would make it necessary to send the bill back to the Senate, and may cause delay. I think I may say that no member of the House who has been in New York and has made a personal inspection of the accommodations for the post office and the United States courts there but will say that it is a disgrace to the Government. It has been a disgrace to the Government for the last ten years that they are served in buildings that would be discreditable to any town of respectable size on the continent. I am glad that there is at last a prospect of having buildings there in which the public business can be properly performed. The United States courts are now accommodated in a building on Chambers street, which was formerly a theater, at a rent of $22,000 a year. The United States courts, representing the judicial dignity of this Government in that district, are accommodated as no man here would want to be accommodated in the discharge of his own private business. Let us pass this bill at once, with as little delay or provision for delay as possible.

Mr. ALLEY. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being first upon Mr. WASHBURN's amendment.

Mr. WENTWORTH called for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. LE BLOND, and WASHBURN of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 49.

So the amendment was agreed to. The joint resolution, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing, from the President of the United States, were communicated to the House by Mr. ROBERT JOHNSON, his Private Secretary.

WIDOW OF JACOB HARMON.

Mr. MAYNARD moved that Senate bill No. 454, for the relief of the widow of Jacob Harmon, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred.

No objection was made; and the bill was accordingly read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

WIDOW OF HENRY FRY.

Mr. MAYNARD also moved that Senate bill No. 455, for the relief of the widow of Henry Fry, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred.

No objection was made; and the bill was accordingly read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

WILLIAM A. AND JACOB M. HINSHAW.

Mr. MAYNARD also moved that Senate bill No. 476, for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, deceased, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred.

No objection was made; and the bill was accordingly read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

NATIONAL SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, reported back with amendments, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, Senate bill No. 177, to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company, of Washington, District of Columbia, with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The amendments were as follows:

Insert the word "special" before the word "deposit" in the third line of section five; so that the same will read "to receive and keep on special deposit," &c.

In line eighteen of the same section strike out the words "funds of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "other funds belonging to;" so as to read "and also to invest the capital or other funds belonging to the said company," &c.

In lines nineteen and twenty of the same section strike out the words "or such money or funds as may be deposited with said company for that purpose."

Add to section eight the following: "nor be deemed to authorize the said corporation to pay interest on deposits of money, securities, or any other property deposited with it; and this corporation shall be confined to the District of Columbia."

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. For the information of the House, I would state that the object of all these amendments is to prevent this corporation from becoming by any possibility a trust or banking company, and to confine its operations to the simple business of safe keeping of articles of value that may be intrusted to it.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MOTHER OF CHARLES O. ROWOHL.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of the mother of Charles O. Rowohl; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

CHARLES T. MARTIN.

Mr. STOKES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Charles T. Martin, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

CONTRACTS FOR FIREARMS.

Mr. PATTERSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House what contracts for firearms, rifles, carbines, and pistols have been made since April 5, 1864; with whom contracted, and the price paid for each arm; whether any contract for arms has been extended or renewed, and if so, with whom, for what length of time, and for what number; whether there has been an increase of price upon any original contract for arms, or upon any extension or renewal, and if so, for what amount and to whom given; whether any contract for arms has been sub-let by the contractor, and if so, upon what conditions.

BOUNTIES AND LOST DISCHARGES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to make a statement to and a request of the House. The Committee on Military Affairs are prepared to report at a very early day a bill upon the subject of bounties and the lost discharges of soldiers, providing for the admission of testimony in relation to the loss. It will probably be a long time before the committee is regularly called, and I therefore ask the House to grant leave to the committee to report that bill at any time; not now, but at any time hereafter, after the expiration of the morning hour.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. LONGYEAR. I ask leave for the withdrawal of the memorial of John H. Hamlin, presented at the last session and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

MURDER OF FEDERAL SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of War, and the accompanying papers, in reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th ultimo, requesting copies of all official documents, orders, letters, and papers of every description relative to the trial, by a military commission, and conviction of Crawford Keys, and others, for the murder of Emory Smith and others, and to the respite of the sentence in the case of said Crawford Keys or either of his associates, their transfer to Fort Delaware, and subsequent release upon a writ of habeas corpus.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 8, 1867.

The message, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed, and on motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, was referred to the select committee on the murder of Federal soldiers in South Carolina.

NAVAL SERVICE FOR STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 19th ultimo, requesting a statement of the amounts charged the State Department since May 1, 1865, for services rendered by naval vessels.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 9, 1867.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PARDONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit the accompanying report from the Attorney General, as a partial reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th ultimo, requesting "a list of names of all persons engaged in the late rebellion against the United States Government who have been pardoned by him from April 15, 1865, to this date; that said list shall also state the rank of each person who has been so pardoned, if he has been engaged in the military service of the so-called confederate government, and the position if he shall have held any civil office under said so-called confederate government, and shall also further state whether such person has at any time prior to April 14, 1861, held any office under the United States Government, and if so, what office, together with the reasons for granting such pardons; and also the names of the person or persons at whose solicitation such pardon was granted."

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 8, 1867.

The message and accompanying documents were, on motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

INCREASED PAY OF CIVIL EMPLOYÉS.

The House, agreeably to order, proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service at Washington.

The joint resolution provides that there shall be allowed and paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following-described persons employed in the civil service at Washington, namely: to clerks, messengers, watchmen, and laborers, and all the civil employés whose pay or salaries do not exceed the sum of $3,500 each, as fixed by law prior to June 30, 1864, and including temporary clerks and female clerks in the Department of State, and in the Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Post Office, and Agricultural Departments; in the office of the Attorney General, Coast Survey, Naval Observatory, navy-yard, Paymaster General, Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands; city post office; enlisted men serving as clerks in the Adjutant General's office, and detectives of the Metropolitan police, an additional compensation of twenty per cent. on their respective salaries or pay for one year from and after the 30th day of June, 1866. It is provided that the additional compensation to the employés of the Patent Office shall be paid out of the funds of that office, and that where the salary or pay of any person entitled to receive additional compensation under this resolution has been increased by law since the date of June 30, 1864, or where such person may have received additional compensation through the action of any head of any Department from funds placed by law in his hands for distribution, such person shall be entitled to receive only so much as will make the whole sum received as additional compensation equal to twenty per cent. on his salary or pay as aforesaid. It is further provided that this resolution shall apply only to such persons as may be in service at the time of its passage, and who were in the civil service at Washington during the whole of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee of Ways and Means have agreed on certain amendments which have been embodied in the following, which I offer as a substitute for the joint resolution:

That there shall be allowed and paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following-described persons employed in the civil service at Washington, namely: to clerks, messengers, watchmen, and laborers, and all the civil employés whose pay or salaries do not exceed the sum of $3,500 each, as fixed by law prior to June 30, 1864, and including temporary clerks and female clerks in the Department of State, and in the Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Post Office, and Agricultural Departments, in the office of the Attorney General, Coast Survey, Naval Observatory, navy-yard, Paymaster General, including the division of referred claims, office of Commissary General of Prisoners, Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, in the office at the Capitol extension, city post office, enlisted men of the Army, Navy, or general service of the United States serving as clerks, messengers, watchmen, or laborers in any bureau of the War Department, lamp-lighters under Commissioner of Public Buildings, and detectives of the Metropolitan police, an additional compensation of twenty per cent. on their respective salaries or pay for one year from and after the 30th day of June, 1866: Provided, That the above-named additional compensation to the employés of the Patent Office be paid out of the funds of said office, and that where the salary or pay of any person entitled to receive additional compensation under this resolution has been increased by law since the date of June 30, 1864, aforesaid, except those clerks in the office of the Quartermaster General whose pay was equalized with that of first-class clerks by act of July, 1866, or where such person may have received during the current fiscal year additional compensation through the action of any head of any Department from funds placed by law in his hands for distribution, such person shall be entitled to receive only so much as will make the whole sum received as additional compensation equal to twenty per cent. on his salary or pay as aforesaid: Provided further, That such additional compensation shall be held to apply to all female clerks or employés in any bureau or division in the Treasury Department whose compensation does not exceed sixty dollars per month: And provided further, That this resolution shall apply only to such persons as may be in service at the time of the passage of this resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I ask why the gentleman confines his last amendment to the Treasury Department?

Mr. GARFIELD. There is an exceptional class in the Treasury Department. The joint resolution reaches every other case of female clerks.

Mr. KASSON. If there is equality in the female clerks of all the Departments, I have no objection; but we have legislated once to establish that equality, and I do not want we shall be compelled to do so again.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the previous question on the substitute.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Let me suggest an amendment in reference to the clerks in the quartermaster's department here.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is provided for.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Not the clerks I refer to. We have in Washington a large office which is not a part of the War Department at all. I desire to incorporate an amendment that the clerks employed in the quartermaster's department of the Army here shall have a like increase. They are graded like other clerks.

Mr. GARFIELD. That question belongs to the Military Committee, and I cannot allow it to come in upon a bill for the civil service.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot see why it should not be allowed to come in as well as others.

Mr. BANKS. Does the substitute extend the increase to soldiers acting as clerks since the 30th of June, 1865?

Mr. GARFIELD. It does.

The SPEAKER. It will facilitate action if the House will consider the substitute as the original bill. If the substitute be now adopted no amendment will be in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I agree to that.

The SPEAKER. It will be so considered, then.

Mr. ALLISON. In line twenty-six of the substitute I move to strike out the word "preceding," so it will read "the current fiscal year."

Mr. GARFIELD. I will now make a statement of what the committee proposes, and when I have concluded I will yield to any gentleman who may wish to make any suggestion.

Mr. ALLISON's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will first speak of the joint resolution as it was originally printed and presented to the House before the amendments were made, and then state what are the amendments which the Committee of Ways and Means propose. I desire to say in the first place that this measure is not designed to supersede any plan for the reorganization of the various Departments of the Government. There are bills pending, which the committee hope will be matured and presented, by which some of the Executive Departments will be thoroughly reorganized. If that reorganization had been made such a bill as this might not have been necessary; but in the absence of any such reorganization it is a matter of temporary relief to a class of employes of the Government who have suffered very greatly from fluctuations of the currency and the advance in the cost of living. It was proposed, as first printed, to restrict the payment of the increase granted by this bill to those persons who had been in the civil service during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and were still in service. That proposition was intended to help those persons who came into the service when prices were lower than they now are, and who suffered from the fluctuations which really changed the conditions of their engagement with the Government. But it was found to cut off many soldiers and sailors who were mustered out of the service during the fall of 1865, and mustered into general service or appointed in the civil service, and who have been employed in the several Departments since that time. We were unwilling to do injustice to so large and meritorious a class of persons, and the committee propose to strike out all after the word "resolution" in line thirty-four, so that whatever is paid as additional compensation to clerks, messengers, and other employes in the civil service at Washington shall be paid to all who are now in service.

In the next place, fearing that the language of the printed bill was too general, the committee propose to insert in line fourteen, after the words "Paymaster General" the words "including the division of referred claims in the office of the Commissary General of Prisoners."

There are two temporary divisions, departments perhaps not recognized directly by law, but established to meet the necessities of the service, which it was feared would not be covered under the general term "War Department;" and for abundant caution we propose to insert the words "including the division of referred claims, office of Commissary General of Prisoners." This is the first of the proposed amendments as they stand in the resolution.

The second amendment is to insert after the words "abandoned lands," in line fifteen, the words "in the office at the Capitol extension," so as to include the clerks, employes, and messengers in that department, who it was thought would not be included in the general terms of the resolution.

The third amendment is to insert after the words "enlisted men," in line sixteen, the words "of the Army, Navy, or general service of the United States," lest the language might not be construed to include all these persons. Perhaps all the members of the House may not know that we have a class of enlisted men who do not properly belong either to the Army or Navy, but are enlisted in what is known as the general service. They are wounded men or men disabled by sickness, who are not fit to enter the field, and perhaps really not fit to go into the Veteran Reserve corps—men who have come out of the service somewhat disabled, who have been enlisted on the same conditions of pay that soldiers are, and are put in the various Departments as clerks, messengers, or laborers. There are also some soldiers and sailors detailed on similar duty. It was therefore thought better to mention them expressly as enlisted men "of the Army, Navy, or general service of the United States."

In the same line, after the word "clerks," the committee propose to add the words "messengers, watchmen, or laborers;" for these three classes are employed in these various Departments.

In the same line we propose to strike out the words "Adjutant General's office," and insert in lieu thereof "any bureau of the War Department, lamp-lighters under the Commissioner of Public Buildings." We found that there were soldiers employed in other bureaus of the War Department who should be included. We found, also, that there are six or seven persons employed by the Commissioner of Public Buildings as lamp-lighters who have not been included in any law increasing pay. This compensation is very small, and the committee thought proper to name them in this connection.

The sixth amendment is to insert in line twenty-six, after the word "aforesaid," the words "except those clerks in the office of the Quartermaster General whose pay was equalized with that of first-class clerks by act of July, 1866."

The reason for this amendment is, that this class of clerks are an exceptional class; men who were in the Army, but who in 1866 were appointed to serve at only seventy-five dollars a month; and who are doing precisely the same duty as first-class clerks who receive $1,200 per annum. They received from Congress last session extra compensation enough to put them on an equality with $1,200 clerks; but if we say that this compensation allowed in this resolution shall not apply to those who have had their pay increased, these men would get nothing while other $1,200 clerks would get the increase. The amendment will remedy the difficulty.

The seventh amendment is in line twenty-six, after the word "received." In order to make it more definite we add the words "during the current fiscal year;" so as not to count any additional pay they may have received in former fiscal years.

The eighth amendment is to insert after the word "aforesaid," in line thirty-two, a proviso "that such additional compensation shall not be held to apply to all female clerks or employes in any bureau or division in the Treasury Department whose compensation does not exceed sixty dollars per month." It is designed to reach that class of female clerks who are hired by the month or by the day and who have not an annual salary fixed by law.

The ninth amendment I have already mentioned; it is to strike out the last paragraph of the resolution, which limits the payment of this additional salary to those who have been in service since June, 1865. We strike it out in order to include soldiers and other clerks who have been appointed since that time.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I will say a few words on the general provisions of the resolution before submitting it for the action of the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman will allow me to inquire if his bill does not contemplate an increase of salaries of twenty per cent. to all persons in the civil service whose salaries are under $3,500.

Mr. GARFIELD. The increase extends to all in the civil service at Washington whose salaries are less than $3,500.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask the gentleman whether it is just to make an exception in favor of those in the civil service to the exclusion of those in the military and naval service?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember that these persons who are here as clerks, messengers, and porters about the War Department are in the civil service; whatever is done for those who are in the Army and Navy proper should be done by the Military and Naval Committees. We are entirely willing that justice shall be done to them, but we do not want to encumber this resolution in reference to the civil service with that class of cases.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House that this is not my resolution. It is offered by the Committee of Ways and Means, and I desire to say for the committee that they found it exceedingly difficult to do anything like justice to persons whom it concerns. It is the uniform testimony of all who know the history of the civil service here in Washington that a very large number of most worthy persons in the civil service at Washington are receiving salaries by no means equivalent to the value of their services. The extravagant cost of living here, and the depreciation of the currency, have so reduced the purchasing power of the money they receive as scarcely to live within their salaries. We recognize their claim as strong and just, but we also find it the almost unanimous testimony of the heads of Departments that a large number of clerks— young men without families, just out of school or older, who were never efficient, but who get twelve, fourteen, or sixteen hundred dollars a year—receive all they ought to receive and more than they could get for similar services in any other place in the United States.

To frame a measure that will pay increased salary to those who deserve it and not pay it to those who do not deserve it is, of course, a matter of the utmost difficulty. The policy adopted during the last session of Congress was to put money in the hands of the heads of Departments and authorize them to distribute it to such clerks as they deemed most deserving. The sum of $250,000 was placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury at one time and $160,000 at another, to be distributed in his Department. But that distribution has given much dissatisfaction, whether justly so I do not know. It is claimed by many that it was distributed to favorites, to those who held peculiar political views—that clerks favoring the President's policy were paid while many who favored the views of Congress were passed by. Whether these allegations are true or not I do not know; but I do know this, that that mode of increasing salaries has given great dissatisfaction.

The committee thought best to limit the increase to all those who receive less than $3,500 a year, believing that there will be a reorganization of the Departments under some of the bills now pending which will more perfectly provide for officers of the various bureaus whose salaries are $3,500 and more.

The question then arose whether we should make this increase permanent or temporary. Everybody hopes, or ought to, that at some golden day, however far distant it may be, we shall reach the solid basis of specie, which fact will in itself be better than an increase of twenty per cent. We thought it not best, therefore, to make a permanent increase which would after a few years be more than either economy or necessity would require.

It was therefore thought best to make the increase for the current fiscal year, and if the necessity arises next year to do the same thing again, rather than to fix a permanent increase of salaries to this large class of persons. Now, I have not a doubt that this resolution will give a large sum of money to a large class of persons who do not deserve it. But I am equally satisfied that this is the only practicable way by which we can pay those who do very much deserve it. Therefore I think we must make the increase apply to all classes of clerks.

We have already paid about one third of a million dollars out of the Treasury to various clerks in the Departments. We provide in this bill that those who have received an increase during the current year shall not have the whole of the increase provided in this bill; but that the increase which they have already received shall be deducted from that granted by this resolution.

Mr. PAINE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to insert the words "and Marine corps" after the words "Army and Navy." It may be that there are no enlisted men of that corps in the Departments now; but there is no reason why there should not be, and this bill should cover those cases.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will modify my amendment so as to include the Marine corps, and now I will yield for a few moments to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call the attention of the House to that portion of the printed bill, at the end, which is stricken out in the substitute. I think there is something good in the lines thus stricken out, and if the reasons offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] are the only reasons which can be given for striking out those lines, then I will propose an amendment reincorporating the original lines as first reported in the bill, with a modification to meet the objection the gentleman has named. I move to insert the following after the word "resolution" in line thirty-four:

And who were in the civil service at Washington during the whole of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, or who prior to such appointment in the civil service have been in the military or naval service of the United States between the 12th day of April, 1861, and the 19th day of April, 1865, and have been honorably discharged therefrom.

One cogent reason for reporting any bill upon this subject is that these clerks and employes have suffered from inadequate salaries through the years 1864, 1865, and 1866. Now, is it reasonable to provide that men who have received appointments here, say on the 1st of January of this year, or during the last six months, should come in and reap the benefits of this bill? I think the House will reach the conclusion that this bill ought to apply to those who have been in service for some considerable length of time, and ought to exclude all recent appointments, save those who have been in the military or naval service of the country. That is the scope of the amendment I have offered, and I hope it will be received without any objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am always sorry to differ with the distinguished chairman of my committee, [Mr. MORRILL;] but it seems to me that if we put on this bill the limitation which he proposes we will wrong a very large class of persons. For instance, we would let in those who were in the military or naval service, no matter how long or how short a time; while a good man who was not physically able to go into the Army or Navy, although he may have served in a civil capacity within two days of the limitation proposed by the amendment of the gentleman, would be entirely excluded from the benefits of this resolution. It seems to me that in thus saving a little money we shall give a very large number of persons good reason to be dissatisfied.

Now, one word more. I will go as far as any reasonable man ought to go in asserting the rights and protecting the interests of those who have been soldiers and sailors of our Army and Navy. For the soldier or sailor who was disabled in the service of his country I will make special demands for the protection and patronage of the Government. But for the able-bodied man, who has come out of the Army with person uninjured and health unimpaired, I do not demand any higher salary than for any other man who was as patriotic as he, but for some worthy reason did not go into the Army. For a wounded soldier I make special demands; but I have no right, as a soldier, to demand anything more from the Government in payment for civil service than any other man whose services are equally valuable.

As the resolution now stands it treats all alike. The gentleman's amendment makes an unjust discrimination, not in favor of soldiers but against civilians. I hope the amendment will not prevail. I call for the previous question.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes thirty-four, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am entitled to the floor, I believe.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] cannot retain the floor. The previous question, which he demanded, has been voted down, and therefore, according to the usage, the floor reverts to some gentleman who opposed the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I offer as a substitute for the whole bill the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. A substitute must be reserved until the original bill has been perfected. It may be reported, however, for information.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c. That the provisions of the eighteenth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," &c., and the same are hereby extended so as to include the clerks, messengers, watchmen, laborers, and other civil employes whose pay or salaries do not exceed the sum of $3,500 each, and including temporary clerks, female clerks, and employes in the Executive Departments and their respective bureaus, and in the Coast Survey office, Naval Observatory, Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, city post office, and in the quartermaster's department of the Department of Washington, enlisted men serving as clerks in the Adjutant General's office and in the office of the Superintendent of Public Printing at Washington; and the amount necessary to pay this allowance is hereby appropriated: Provided, That this additional compensation to the employes of the Patent Office be paid out of the funds of said office.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I would not trouble the House even for a moment, except that I think my friend from Illinois, whose amendment commends itself certainly to my judgment, did not make as full a statement of its purpose as it is entitled to have.

It will be observed that the committee propose, among other amendments to the bill as printed, to strike out after the word "resolution," in the thirty-fourth line, the following words:

And who were in the civil service at Washington during the whole of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866.

The obvious and intended effect of this, as explained, is to add twenty per cent. to the compensation of every one of these clerks or employes who may be in the civil service on the day when this resolution shall pass. This will include every appointment of every sort that has been made within the last year or two years; and while there are going out of the service, by reason of changes which have been made, many worthy and excellent men who will get no benefit from this bill, those persons who have been "crooking the pregnant hinges of the knee" to get their places will all be rewarded for having thus come in. Sir, I object to any such provision. It holds out a premium for the lowest, vilest, meanest subserviency that probably the political history of this country has ever exhibited.

Now, sir, what the gentleman from Illinois proposes is to retain those words of restriction so that this increase of pay shall apply to those only who were in office during the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1866, with a further proviso to save the rights of certain other classes; and these other classes whose rights are to be saved are those who, prior to such appointment in the civil service, were in the military or naval service of the United States between the 12th day of April, 1861, and the 19th day of April, 1865, and were honorably discharged therefrom. Wherever the President has kept faith with the soldiers, and according to his promises has, where vacancies occurred or were made, conferred appointments upon them, I for one am willing, not only that faith shall be kept on the part of the President, but that we shall follow it up by increasing the compensation of those persons.

But where changes have been made, as in a large class they have been, on mere political grounds as mere rewards for subserviency to power, I am unwilling that a bonus shall be held out to those who have been substituted in the place of at least as good, if not better men, who did not wish to show themselves ready to abase the manhood which was in them.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] my colleague, says he does not recognize the able-bodied soldier as having any claims whatever or advantages any civilian has or can have here.

Mr. GARFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not say so. I said so far as the question of the Government paying them compensation in civil offices I regarded them as on the same basis as others of equal merit.

Mr. SCHENCK. Precisely. I take it upon that ground. I propose, as I said before, where appointments have been made carrying out in good faith what was declared as the rule of appointment by the President we will save their rights, whether they be able-bodied or wounded; but the difficulty in the gentleman's provision now is that he admits all without discrimination, not merely soldiers wounded or not wounded, but all civilians. He holds out, as I insist, a premium or bonus for subserviency, which does not apply in the case of a soldier, at least, to the same extent as it does apply in regard to civil appointments.

Mr. Speaker, there is no use of blinking this matter. I say the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General have appointed men in my district in whom the people in the different localities have no confidence whatever, whom they did not desire to have appointed; and that the rule of appointment which took place in those localities, we have good reason for knowing, has taken place in all of these departments in Washington where ever this kind of patronage could be exercised and made to serve as a reward for subserviency to the powers that be. And I have nothing to retract which I have said in general denunciation of the whole of them.

I repeat, never in the whole history of this country has there been any party so purely a mere bread-and-butter brigade as these creatures who have crawled into office within the last year or two hereabouts and throughout the country. They are a party who do not pretend to have any principles. The Democrats repudiate them; the Republicans repudiate them. They do not profess to belong to the Republican party. They say they have not gone over to the Democrats, and yet they have commended themselves to the powers in authority so as to obtain their offices. And mark you how? They did it without any clear political creed of any kind but by thus abasing themselves before the footstool of that power.

Now, I agree with the committee entirely that some bill like this is necessary, some bill like this is just and more than just, it is generous; but I wish to pass a bill with such a restriction as shall not operate as an encouragement to this class of men. I say there are now, if I am rightly informed, and I have no doubt on the subject, more than one, at least one person in the employ of the Government who has heretofore been in the employ of the so-called confederacy. Yet that man, yet these men, yet men of this kind under the provisions of this bill will be treated precisely in the same way as those who bore the heat and burden of the day when we were endeavoring to put down that infernal rebellion which they were assisting and attempting to uphold. Though something of this kind is necessary, it is necessary, as I consider, it should be restricted in some such way as proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] I am willing to admit something of this sort must have the sanction of Congress and be fixed as the mode of compensation by law, because we cannot trust the Secretary of the Treasury or perhaps any head of Department to carry out the purpose of Congress. What did he do? We placed in his hands one time and another within the last four years $400,000 to be distributed among the clerks, for the reason that the means of subsistence had become so enormously high they were not able scarcely to keep soul and body together, much less those who had families to provide for those families. What did he do? Although this House and this Congress desired those whom the rise of the waters of high prices had reached, and who by that rise of the waters had been submerged, instead of giving it to the clerks who received the lowest salaries, he selected the heads of divisions and chief clerks, already receiving the highest salaries, and paid nothing to those who received the lowest salaries.

A MEMBER. Paid to the pets of the Department.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir; paid to the pets of the Department. I speak of that of which I have knowledge. I went to the Secretary of the Treasury and remonstrated with him upon this construction of the law and this application of the fund, and it was explained to me that there were in the Department a great many gentlemen of high intelligence and commanding ability who were receiving already the highest salaries and who could get higher salaries elsewhere, and to prevent their going elsewhere for employment it was necessary to distribute this fund; but as to these little fellows, the twelve or fourteen hundred dollar chaps, he could get upon the ringing of the bell as many as he pleased any day. Well, that may be so, but I hold that the intention of the Government as represented in Congress was to help those who most needed help, and not squander the fund on favorites of the Department, nor give it to those that had most. There may be scriptural authority for that—taking away from him that hath nothing that which he hath, paradoxical as it may seem to be—but I do not think it was intended by Congress to make any such misapplication of Scripture in this case.

It may be argued that these men who have come in from the military service or from civil life into these Departments, displacing other men, are as much entitled to an increase of compensation as any other, and that there should be no common law which would exclude any portion of them. They came in, Mr. Speaker, during high prices. They came in recently, accepting what they knew was the position, and how comparatively inadequate was the compensation for the service. So there is no particular hardship to them. Civilians who came to Washington and sought this employment, displacing other men, during the years 1865 and 1866, are not entitled to very much sympathy when we take into account the fact that they knew what they were seeking and what compensation they were to get for the service they were to perform.

Mr. GRINNELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to state that I had prepared an amendment, which I propose to send up at the proper time, providing for those who were dismissed from the service on the 31st of December, 1866. Now, sir, it is manifestly unjust to those who have come into these places during a period of low prices, and are now removed for political opinions, that they should be cut off altogether. I propose that those who were dismissed prior to the 1st of January, 1867, without being charged with fraud or malfeasance shall be regarded as well as the other class.

I also propose that no person who has been in the civil service or in the army or navy in the so-called confederate States shall be included. Sir, my constituents have been turned out of these offices to give place to rebels who shot bullets at their hearts, and I am called upon to vote that these same rebels shall receive extra compensation while my friends have been proscribed. I never can be a party to the wrong of cutting off altogether from this compensation those who went out with the departure of the year 1866. I therefore propose at the proper time to offer the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was about to say, before I yielded to the gentleman from Iowa, in reference to those who accepted these places recently, that they are on a different footing from the older employes; that those who were formerly in the service entered it a time when, by our legislation and by the exigencies of the country, there had not been this enormous inflation of prices, and it is proper that they should have the increase of pay; but not those who came in within the last year or two, who are alone excluded by the provisions of the bill as originally reported. They came in after this inflation and after this legislation of Congress, and there can be no pretense on their part that by our legislation and by the consequent condition of the country the terms of their engagement have been in any respect virtually altered, or their salaries practically lowered by reason of the lowering of the standard of the currency of the country.

Now, sir, I felt impelled to make these remarks from a feeling that the honorable member from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL], was not presenting his amendment in such a manner as that the House could distinctly understand it, he assuming that they all did so without any further explanation of what he was aiming at. He proposes to leave this bill as originally reported, cutting off the persons who have accepted office within the last year or two from the benefit of its provisions, but adding to it a further clause to extend its benefits to every man who has been in the military service of the country in any capacity during the war.

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I have prepared an amendment which I think will meet the views of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I desire to have it read.

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the gentleman for a moment for that purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That this resolution shall not apply to any member of the Johnson Departmental Club.

[Laughter.] Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I think that will cover the whole ground.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not in order as an amendment to the pending amendment.

Mr. MYERS. I intend, Mr. Speaker, after a very few words, to offer an amendment to come in on the nineteenth and twentieth lines on the second page of the bill as reported. My objection to the joint resolution and to the several amendments is only this: that the resolution does not go far enough. The resolution only proposes to give additional compensation to these several employes for six months up to the 1st of January of this year.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken; it extends to a whole year.

Mr. MYERS. It applies to six months from now, but it only dates back six months. Now this Congress has voted to increase the pay of its members; it has voted to do some little justice to our soldiers, and will probably do the same for the sailors who were accidentally omitted in the bounty bill, without regard to any lapse of time. The country has sanctioned both measures. I believe that a like meed of justice should be accorded to this clerical force and these employes of the Government, whose salaries have not been increased since the commencement of the war, while prices have been continually advancing and still seem to keep up.

Sir, I am in favor of economy as much as any gentleman here; not that economy which turns men out of a navy-yard at this season of the year, and for want of proper precautions allows millions of dollars to be lost by the burning of a noble vessel; not that economy which appoints dishonest revenue officers, diminishing our receipts from that source and adding to the burdens of the honest tax-payers. But the true political theory I declare, is that all men have a right to a living and that the laborer is worthy of his hire. I believe that this bill does not go far enough back in paying these men what they deserve.

Now, I concur in many of the suggestions which fell from the lips of the gentleman who preceded me, and all I have to say is that I shall not press my amendment if it appears to be objectionable to the House. I believe that these men would rather have their salaries increased back to the commencement of the year 1866, when they were suffering from high prices, than to have it run for six months from this date and six months for the last year. That is all I have to say, and I hope the gentleman who offered this bill will embody my amendment in it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman that his amendment is not in order at this point, and that it belongs to another part of the bill.

I wish to say a word or two and then to close the debate on the pending amendments. I perfectly agree with my colleague who addressed the House a moment ago [Mr. SCHENCK] on the point that those appointments that have been made during the last eight months have many of them been made on the most shameful principle of political favoritism. I would have been glad, if we could have done it, to reach all such persons; but I am in favor of doing whatever I do directly, and if the gentleman wants to do it, let him bring forward a proposition that no person appointed for political reasons shall receive any of this extra compensation. Now, he proposes to do it in an indirect way, and at the expense of our true friends. And I desire to show that that is so.

If any gentleman desires to make a political argument, purely as such, I would like him to state in the first place at what time President Johnson and his administration began to make appointments in the Departments of our political enemies. He will probably say that it was begun about the month of March, 1866, after the 22d of February, and from March to May last. Then I would ask, what about all those persons who were appointed from the day President Lincoln died to May last, say a year or more? Everybody appointed within that period, long before political appointments were made, all our friends thus appointed the gentleman proposes to cut off, every man of them, for the sake of punishing a few appointed since that time.

And what else does he propose to do? He says he wants to let the soldiers in. He desires to open the door to any soldier or sailor who prostituted himself to Mr. Johnson, and bowed before him for the sake of getting an appointment. If a soldier disgraced himself to obtain an appointment, my colleague says we should pay him. But he proposes to cut off at a single blow all the appointments made one whole year before these political appointments were made, and in regard to whom there is not the least taint of political favoritism. Now, I would be willing to drown a fly or to kill a gnat; but I do not propose to set the ocean in motion and kill the children for the sake of killing a gnat. Now, it seems to me that the proposition of my colleague on the committee, [Mr. MORRILL], for the sake of accomplishing a purpose indirectly, does ten times the injustice he proposes to remedy.

I now call the pending question on the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Would a motion to recommit be in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. It would not, pending the order for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was upon the following amendment by Mr. MORRILL:

In line thirty-four, after the word "resolution," insert the following:

And who were in the civil service at Washington during the whole of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, or who, prior to such appointment in the civil service, had been in the military or naval service of the United States between the 12th day of April, 1861, and the 19th day of April, 1865, and had been honorably discharged therefrom.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 48, noes 69.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. MORRILL called for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 88, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Baldwin, Baxter, Benjamin, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Cook, Callom, Culver, Davis, Deming, Dixon, Eckley, Farquhar, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Henderson, Holmes, Hooper, Jenckes, Kelso, Koonitz, William Lawrence, Maynard, Mercer, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Pike, Plants, Price, Schenck, Scofield, Stokes, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Van Arnam, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Williams, and James F. Wilson—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Boutwell, Boyer, Buckland, Campbell, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cooper, Dawes, Defrees, Denison, Dodge, Driggs, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, LeBlond, Lettwich, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McKee, McRuer, Miller, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Paine, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Sawyer, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Welker, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Winfield—88.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Banks, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Bundy, Conkling, Darling, Dawson, Delano, Donnelly, Dumont, Elliot, Goodyear, Hale, Harris, Hise, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Laffin, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, McClurg, McCullough, McIndoe, Moorhead, Morris, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pomroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Rousseau, Shellabarger, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Woodbridge, and Wright—53.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now call the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire permission to make a few remarks upon the substitute which I have offered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will be entitled to one hour after the previous question shall have been seconded.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will give the gentleman some of my time after the previous question is seconded.

Mr. PIKE. I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to the terms of the bill as contained in line eight, and I would inquire of him whether, in view of that provision, this increase of pay will apply to the officers of the internal revenue department as reorganized under the act of July last.

Mr. GARFIELD. The bill is intended to apply except in those cases where the salary has already been increased.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to put an inquiry to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] He has stated that this bill is intended to apply to clerks in this city. I wish to ask him whether it will include railway messengers and clerk.

Mr. GARFIELD. It will not.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Is it not proper that they should be included?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; because they are scattered all over the country. The special reason for the passage of this bill is the extremely high price of living in the city of Washington.

Mr. ALLISON. Will my colleague on the committee [Mr. GARFIELD] permit me to move an amendment, to strike out from line thirty-two down to and including the word "resolution" in line thirty-four? The words I propose to strike out are the following:

And provided further, That this resolution shall apply only to such persons as may be in service at the time of the passage of this resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot yield for that amendment. I demand the previous question.

On seconding the call for the previous question there were—ayes 57, noes 42.

Mr. LOAN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. LOAN and ALLISON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 53.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is entitled to the floor to close the debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the substitute I have proposed simply extends to the clerks and employes of the different Departments in Washington the benefits of the eighteenth section of the appropriation bill of last session, which gave an increased allowance of twenty per cent. to all the employes of Congress, the clerks of committees, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the door-keepers, the workmen and employes about the public gardens, the Librarian and assistant librarians.

Now, sir, Congress has raised the salaries of members, commencing with the 4th of March, 1865. We have increased the pay of all the officers and employes of Congress by an addition of twenty per cent., commencing at the same time. If we are to be consistent, we shall allow to the clerks and employes of the Departments the benefits of the same increase. If we have found by experience that it was necessary to increase our own pay, and the pay of the officers and employes of Congress, in order to enable us and them to live in the city of Washington, there is the same necessity for increasing the pay of the clerks and employes of the Departments during the same time.

The section which I propose to extend is without limitation as to time. Whether that section will be construed to give the additional twenty per cent. after the 4th of March next, I am not prepared to say. It is not material to discuss the question whether that section will be so construed or not. If it is construed to extend beyond the 4th of March next, Congress can at any time, if it sees fit, cut off this increased pay. On the other hand, if the additional compensation is construed not to extend beyond the 4th of March next, Congress can, by additional legislation and additional appropriations, continue this increased pay beyond that time. My amendment proposes simply to extend to the Departments the provisions of that section, with whatever construction the Departments themselves may give to it.

I for one believe that it is proper and necessary to increase the pay of that very large and very deserving class of clerks and employes engaged in the Departments in this city. I know many a clerk here, receiving a yearly salary of $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, or $1,800, who is cramped from month to month to make both ends meet, and who with his family is obliged to live in a most humble manner, in a little room in the third or fourth story, with scanty furniture and but very few of the surroundings of a comfortable home. In my opinion, it is a debt the Government owes these men to so increase their salaries as to enable them to live in a manner becoming employes of the Government of the United States.

My amendment also embraces what is not embraced in the bill—a provision for the clerks in the quartermaster's department of the department of Washington. There are, I suppose, from fifty to one hundred of these clerks who are obliged to live in the city of Washington. They are certainly just as deserving as the clerks in the city post office or the coast survey or any other department or bureau of the Government.

It will be borne in mind, as I presume most of the members of Congress already know, that nearly all of the supplies taken from the depot in Washington go through the quartermaster's department of the department of Washington. First they go from the quartermaster's department of the Army to the department of Washington, and by that department are issued to the different depots. The whole burial service, the charge of the various national cemeteries, is under the control of the quartermaster's department in the department of Washington. This requires a great many clerks. They have the same grades of clerks as the others, and there certainly can be no reason why these clerks should not be embraced as well as the others.

With that exception I believe the substitute embraces the same that the original bill does. It gives them pay from the 4th of March, 1865, precisely as we gave additional compensation to the employes of Congress. I think it is proper and consistent, and the only consistent thing we can do. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. GRINNELL. I understood the gentleman reporting this bill that he would allow a vote to be taken on my amendment, which was to extend this additional compensation to those persons who, on the 30th of December, 1866, had been dismissed from office, excepting those dismissed on account of fraud or malfeasance in office, or who at any time had been in the so-called confederate service. But, sir, as the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered, and no opportunity will be afforded to the House to take a vote on that amendment, I prefer to vote against this bill rather than do a great injustice to those who have been driven out of the service before the 1st of January. This bill proposes to mete out justice, and yet it does not provide for those who have suffered doubly, those who have been proscribed for their political opinions, or perhaps for personal reasons. What have we to decide here? Shall we reward those who took the places of our friends, whose political heads were chopped off? Shall we punish our own radical friends who have been removed, and favor those who have taken their places? Shall we take care of those who have been appointed in place of those who have been removed since the close of the last session merely because of their loyalty? I shall be a party to no such proceeding. I propose to be true to our friends if I can, and to stand up for those who would rather lose office than betray their principles.

I regret the gentleman who reported this bill did not allow us to vote on my amendment, so that we could do justice to those who fell because they refused to betray the principles of loyalty and desert the Union cause. As the case now stands, I shall oppose the bill with the hope of getting something better.

Mr. BANKS. There are some officers affected by this bill who have the superintendency of one hundred and two hundred clerks, and who have received from the heads of Departments allowance in the way of increased compensation. They fear the operation of this bill will be to reduce the salaries that they receive. Will it have that effect?

Mr. GARFIELD. It will not require any person to refund any money. That has been carefully guarded against.

Mr. BANKS. It authorizes them to receive the increased compensation they now receive.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is $100,000 in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury under a former law which he can distribute according to his discretion. It is intended for mere temporary clerks.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. The gentleman who has charge of the bill will yield to me for a moment. I thought there were great defects in the original bill, but I have become persuaded that those defects have been cured by the substitute.

The first object of the American Congress is to do right, and the second to give the public satisfaction. It is impossible, in passing such a measure of relief, to make the discriminations which our friends think ought to be made without great injustice and creating great public dissatisfaction. If there are men in office who have taken part with the so-called confederacy they ought to be turned out; and if they cannot be turned out in any other way the power that placed them there ought to be overthrown. We cannot make discriminations without doing injustice and without creating public dissatisfaction. I believe this bill is as broad as we can make it, and I prefer it as it now stands before the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. I see it is proposed to add twenty per cent. to the pay of all those whose salaries do not exceed the sum of $3,500. I ask the gentleman whether by that provision the $3,500 officers are not in a better condition than those who now get $4,000. Will they not get $4,200, or $200 more than the other class?

Mr. GARFIELD. The surplus funds are in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and he can regulate the matter. But we want to make a limit somewhere; we do not want to pay this increase to all the high class clerks. If there should be half a dozen such as the gentleman speaks of there would have to be some remedy provided for them hereafter.

Mr. MAYNARD. Could not the gentleman have remedied that difficulty by saying that no pay should exceed a certain amount as a maximum?

Mr. GARFIELD. Perhaps it might be done. I now yield a few moments to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. MORRILL. I should have much preferred the bill with my amendment added. I still prefer it as it stands to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.] It is more carefully guarded throughout. But in regard to the substitute, according to the gentleman's own confession, he does not know how it will be construed or how long it is to continue to operate. The present bill will probably take from the Treasury not less than a million and a quarter of money. If my amendment had been adopted it would have saved a quarter of a million. If the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois prevails I shall be compelled to vote against the whole bill, and move to lay it on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. ALLISON. I presume the object of this bill is to pay the clerks and employés of the various Departments of the Government what they earn and are fairly entitled to. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is to have the increased compensation date back to the 4th of March, 1865, and the reason he gives for it is that we have allowed our own clerks and employés twenty per cent. additional compensation, beginning with the present Congress. The salaries of these various clerks begin and end with the fiscal year, while the salaries of employés in the two Houses begin and end with the Congress. Therefore the reason for the adoption of the provision in the eighteenth section in the appropriation bill of last year does not apply to that class of clerks.

But the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois will go still further. It will allow the employés in the Treasury Department, who for the fiscal year ending in 1866 have received additional compensation in the aggregate to the amount of $200,000, to still receive the additional twenty per cent.; and it fails to meet the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, which discloses the fact that this sum was disbursed among a higher class of clerks, and not that class who are presumed to be the most needy.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I propose, with the permission of the House, to amend the substitute in that particular by adding to it the same proviso that is in the original bill, cutting off those who have already received additional compensation from the benefits of the bill. If the House will permit me I will amend the bill in that particular; if not, it may be done in the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall, of course, object to that amendment unless we go back and amend the original bill, so as to include a proposition which is just and ought to be inserted in it, which will allow all clerks, whether they are in the employment of the Government to-day or were so yesterday, to come in and receive the additional compensation. The Government of the United States is not an eleemosynary corporation, dealing out charities to clerks. We are paying these men because we believe they are entitled to compensation for service rendered, and there is no reason why a clerk who may be employed tomorrow should not receive additional compensation if he earns it, nor that a clerk who was discharged yesterday for political or other reasons should not receive that compensation if he has earned it during the fiscal year 1866.

Now, I am opposed to this discrimination. We should not discriminate against any class of clerks—and that proposition is clearly comprehended in the original bill—but if we are to appropriate from one to two million dollars, that will be the effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois. It will be simply a gratuity to this class after the 4th of March, 1866. I do not feel called upon to give them such gratuity, and I shall vote against this whole proposition, unless it is confined to the current fiscal year and includes every class of clerks in the Executive Departments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will now yield ten minutes to my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and then I shall occupy five minutes of the time of the House before I call the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am very sorry that this bill has assumed its present shape. I do not wish to be considered as having done injustice to any one in the remarks which I made before in the discussion of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] when I undertook to draw a distinction between those who had served in the Army or Navy of the United States during the recent war to put down the rebellion, and those who have sought and obtained those places, often, at least, to the exclusion of better men than themselves.

I know the difficulty which surrounds this whole subject. I know that it is hard to adapt the law to the condition of things so as to make its operation equitable. I know it is hard to adapt a law so as to have operation upon particular classes of individuals only. Certainly we cannot do it as to individuals. But in the remarks which I made I did not mean to object to men on account of their political views.

I believe that if the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] had been adopted, it would have prevented what will now be the effect of this bill if it pass—a reward given to any and every one who within the last year or two has been a party to this miserable prostitution to which I referred. I did not call it political prostitution, because I do not recognize the men of whom I spoke as having any political status; they are not Democrats, they are not Republicans. Some of them profess to have affinities with the one side or the other. But if they have a platform at all, it is but a platform resting upon the advocacy of whatever will give them "bread and butter." Now, sir, the only way of reaching such men is to strike at the "bread and butter;" the only principle of action which they could be supposed to be at all sensitive about. And it is for us, as far as we may, to reach toward that which they have regarded as the holiest and above all things. In doing this I admit there is difficulty. We may without meaning it strike some good man. But in not doing so we permit to escape a whole class of men who I think are unworthy of the support and unworthy of the generous action of Congress in their behalf.

Now, sir, in order to show what sort of people these are for whom we are legislating indiscriminately, I propose to lay before the House the proceedings which took place some short time ago, as far as they have reached the public, of what is called the Johnson Departmental Club. These resolutions have been heretofore the subject of comment elsewhere, and the club have replied to the comments made upon them in the Senate of the United States. It needs no further remark to illustrate the temper of these persons and their line of conduct than to read what they said. These men, for whom we are asked, thus indiscriminately and loosely to legislate, adopted the resolutions which I am about to read. And mark you, this goes back a whole year and a half; it goes back so as to reach that time at which my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] says there had been no demonstration of this miserable, subservient spirit by which office was to be obtained from the Executive; I read the preamble to their resolutions:

"Whereas the present crisis of this country calls for a full and honest expression of political sentiments and a firm adhesion to the Constitution of our land and the cardinal principles of government as enunciated and established by our fathers; and whereas the present Congress of the United States, in usurping the judicial and executive functions of the Government, in overriding all the State authority and jurisdiction, in defying the manifest sentiments and wishes of a vast majority of the people of the country, is rapidly changing our republican system of government into a despotism as unmitigated as ever was that of Austria; and whereas we are uncompromisingly opposed to all such inroads upon the established principles of the Government, and as unwaveringly indorse and support the past and administrative policy of President Andrew Johnson, particularly that of the readjustment of the late rebellious States; and whereas, as honorable men, holding office under his Administration, feel it incumbent upon us either to sustain him in his noble efforts to preserve the Constitution and the liberties of the people against the infractions of Congress, or, if opposing him, to resign our positions for those who do sustain him;"

And so on to the end of the chapter.

This is signed by "Robert Wright, president," and by "Ferdinand L. Sarmiento, secretary," of the Johnson Departmental Club. I do not know who Robert Wright is; I have not the honor of an acquaintance with Ferdinand L. Sarmiento; nor do I know Richard H. Jackson, who moves the publication of this manifesto in the public press. But I know that Jackson and Wright and Sarmiento, in all human probability, are poor devils, [laughter,] unworthy of any help from this Congress or from any authority of the Government. They are political enuchs, who, if Jeff. Davis were in power, would pass just such a resolution to-morrow for him; who, if our friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] were elected President to-morrow, would as humbly bend to him. That is just what I know of them without a personal acquaintance with them, and what everybody must know of them and of all such fellows.

There came to my notice yesterday the case of a clerk who was dismissed from one of the bureaus in a Department for having spoken, it was said, disrespectfully of the President and in favor of Congress; for having "slandered the President." And I believe the miserable spy and pimp who gave the information got his place. That is perfectly characteristic of what all such fellows are; about what they would do.

But let us go on a little further with these Johnson Departmental Club resolutions. I have not time, rich as this sort of literature is, to read to the end the long resolution of which I have given a sample.

The second resolution, and that resolution fixes the date of publication, is one in which this club cordially indorses the speeches of certain political secretaries, made when they were serenaded in order to bring them out and see whether they were fit to be the constitutional advisers of the President of the United States.

Then, after the high eulogy in the second resolution upon the Secretary of the Treasury and others, in the third resolution their respects are bestowed upon two members of the Cabinet, who did not come up to their standard:

"Resolved, That the replies of Secretary Harlan and Attorney General Speed were characteristic, and leave no room to doubt, as long generally believed"—

So it seems they had suspected them for a great while.

"but what they are opposed to the President's readjustment policy; that they are but clogs in the machinery of the Government; obstacles in the way of the early restoration of the Union, prejudicing equally the success of the President's administration and the welfare of the country; that as Cabinet officers, hostile to the avowed policy of the President, they manifestly retain their positions in bad faith, for sinister and ulterior purposes and to embarrass as far as they can his attempts to heal the wounds of the country. Being at least opposed to his policy, they are incapable of rendering him that assistance and earnest coöperation essential to his complete success, and should give place to others more worthy and competent who can; that justice to the people and to the Government and the necessities and welfare of the country alike demand their immediate resignation or removal."

I believe they did resign soon afterward.

Mr. LATHAM. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection.

Mr. LATHAM. Can the gentleman inform the House whether these parties of whom he is speaking were appointed in the Departments prior to the 30th day of June, 1866, or since that time?

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot tell. I only refer to them as a sample of the lot; I only refer to them to show by what means and professions men retain office, but still more as an exemplification of the kind of miserable, base subserviency and abuse of everything but the President by which they obtained office. I want some discrimination which shall draw a distinction between men animated by such principles only, if that can be called principle at all, and other classes of men who might reasonably be presumed to be more honest.

Mr. LATHAM. Can the gentleman give us any information by whom they were appointed?

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot.

Mr. LATHAM. Or whether they are not honest now?

Mr. SCHENCK. As to that—

Mr. ROSS. I would suggest to the gentleman, in order to obviate the difficulty, that he should provide that those who sustain Congress should be paid. He might obviate the difficulty in that way.

Mr. SCHENCK. That would hardly answer the purpose, for it would take the whole people of the country into pay. [Laughter.] Our support is not derived from a few miserable petty clerks here in the Departments, but it is resting now upon a very much wider basis, the masses of the people, those millions from whom the gentleman would do well to learn, if he would turn his face toward the people and not in other directions.

I suppose I ought not to comment upon these men, nor upon their course, nor upon the propriety of excluding, as far as we can, from the benefits of this bill classes of men such as they are; I know what I may expect. It seems that a Senator made some reference in debate to these resolutions, after they were published in the public press upon the motion of this Mr. Richard H. Jackson, and he was met with a response in these words:

"Resolved, That we hurl back with indignation and scorn the imputation of the Senator from California that this club is unworthy of respect; that it condescends to notice but to watch him and all such Senators who would trample upon the Constitution and the liberties of the people, who desire anarchy rather than peace, disunion rather than the restoration of States to their proper functions under the Constitution of the United States."

Why, sir, this is dreadful, [laughter,] and I suppose I may expect something just like this with which Senator CONNESS was visited for having called attention to the sort of men who are now thronging these Departments, many of them having found their way there within the last year or two years, and many others, I regret to say, having assumed this disgraceful attitude after having been appointed under such circumstances as might have given them better manners and better principles.

I think I understand the principles, or rather the one principle, of this "bread and butter" party. I have already alluded to it; but any one who has read the proceedings of the Cleveland convention—which I regret to say was made up in the main, if not altogether, of those who had actually served in the armies of the United States—has seen a very peculiar development in the address of that convention. The authors of that address speak of the amendments proposed by Congress to the Constitution of the United States. Those amendments are four. To the first, the second, and the fourth they make little or no objection, or at the best they present but feeble arguments against them. They reserve all their wrath for the third of those proposed amendments. What is that? It provides in effect that certain persons who have held office under the General Government or the States who have taken an oath of allegiance to the United States and afterward engaged in rebellion and treason shall be debarred from holding office under the United States until they shall be purged of their disability by a vote of two thirds of both Houses of Congress. Those men who met at Cleveland could look with calmness upon the idea of executing rebels, of hanging them. That is nothing more than they deserved. Maury and Benjamin and Toombs and Breckinridge, by running away immediately after the close of hostilities, evinced their conviction that they deserved death. The same is true of Jefferson Davis, except that he, being entangled in the folds of a certain garment of his wife, was, unfortunately for him, caught before he was able to consummate his purposed escape. The men who constituted the Cleveland convention were willing that rebels should be hung, were willing that they should be banished, were willing that they should be deprived of the privilege of voting, were willing that their property should be confiscated. Any or all of these things they seem to think rebels might deserve. But when we propose none of these, but only the simple punishment of debarring a certain class of rebels from the privilege of holding office, these fellows at Cleveland, the peculiar friends of Andrew Johnson, roll up the whites of their eyes in pious horror and exclaim: "For God's sake do not think of inflicting upon any being wearing the image of humanity such cruelty as to deprive him of the chance of being an assessor or a collector or a postmaster!"

But, Mr. Speaker, my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] by whose courtesy alone I am permitted to speak, desires again the floor to put an end to all debate. I close therefore with the single remark, that I recognize the justice of some relief such as that provided for by this bill to the inadequately compensated clerks and employés of the Government in this city. I would gladly have discriminated, if it had been possible, in favor of those who have come into the civil service from the military and against those who have only reached or held their places by a spirit of mean subserviency. The amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] would have partially accomplished this. But, as I cannot get this act of legislation in the shape in which it would have been more specially agreeable to my views, I have nothing left me but to vote for the bill as the best we can get; but I do not despair of getting it even yet into some better and more acceptable shape.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] to yield to me for about two minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. As no member on the other side has been heard, I will yield the gentleman three minutes, if that will satisfy him.

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, I supposed when this bill came up that it was a bill for the purpose of increasing the pay of clerks in the Departments. I am in favor of such an increase. I believe it is demanded by considerations of propriety and justice. I cannot see how members here who voted to increase their own pay can consistently refuse to increase the compensation of these clerks, who receive salaries far below those of members of Congress. But, sir, I have finally come to the conclusion, after hearing the remarks of my colleague from the Dayton district, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that this is a bill for a very different purpose; that I was entirely mistaken in my view of its character. The gentleman has manifested a great deal of bitterness; why, I cannot tell. It is possible that the diminished vote received by him at the last election has had something to do with the vindictive manner in which he has presented this case, and accounts for the evident animus of his remarks.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. LE BLOND. It is possible some of the appointees of Andrew Johnson have inflicted a wound upon my colleague, not seriously I hope. I hope he will survive. From the manner he treats the whole question, one would suppose some of Andrew Johnson's appointees had given him a deadly wound and that he is struggling to live.

I was trying to rise to a question of order that he had progressed five or six minutes and had not said a word against Andrew Johnson and his appointees, but very soon I was relieved from that trouble, for he fell back upon his old scheme of opposing Andrew Johnson. And for what? For doing what every President has done since the organization of the Government down to the present time: appointed men of his own choice, men to carry out his own policy. But that does not suit the views of my friend who received at the last election a diminished majority, and he is to avenge himself against the President because he was not so popular at the last election as he seemed at the first. I thank my colleague for the courtesy he has extended to me.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not propose to say more than a few words. I am right in saying there has been no change in the bill except those recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means. The amendments of the committee are embodied in the substitute. I trust gentlemen will not be confused when they come to vote. The bill as amended by the Committee of Ways and Means is the substitute now before the House. It confines this to the present fiscal year, while the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] runs back and makes the additional pay continuous. This is all in the judgment of the Committee of Ways and Means that can justly be given. I would be glad as well as my colleague from the Dayton district, if I knew how to do it properly, to reward those who have been turned out and punish those who have been put in their places. I know of no other way than to let the rain fall upon the just and unjust alike. I call for a vote.

Mr. HILL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the motion be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. McDONALD, Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed Senate bill No. 456, for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION—AGAIN.

The question recurred on Mr. FARNSWORTH'S substitute.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 63.

So the substitute was defeated.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty-five minutes past four o'clock) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of J. Cory, Jr., relative to freedom.

Also, the petition of J. S. Palmer, and 31 others, ladies of Laporte county, Indiana, asking for the right of suffrage.

By Mr. BALDWIN: The petition of A. P. Armbruster, and others, concerning the internal revenue tax on cigars.

By Mr. BENJAMIN: The petition of Union citizens of Nueces county, Texas, asking relief against the decisions of the present rebel courts of Texas confirming the confiscation of property of Union men, and praying for protection from Congress.

By Mr. BUCKLAND: The petition of the mayor and city council of the city of Sandusky, for the establishment of a naval depot in the Sandusky bay, at or near that city.

Also, the petition of H. Lockwood, and 45 others, citizens of Huron, Milan, and vicinity, Erie county, Ohio, for the establishment of a naval depot at Huron, Ohio.

Also, the petition of La Q. Rawson, and 85 others, citizens of Fremont, Ohio, against the curtailment of the national currency, and against compelling the national banks, wherever located, to redeem their bills in the city of New York, and against prohibiting the payment of interest on bank balances.

By Mr. COOK: The petition of certain citizens of the State of Illinois, praying that an inquiry be made into the omissions of duty and usurpations of power charged against the President of the United States.

By Mr. HOGAN: The memorial of workers, in steel in St. Louis, Missouri, against any increase of duty on steel.

By Mr. KELLEY: The memorial of 662 citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, manufacturers and operators in cotton and woolen fabrics, praying Congress to relieve them from the heavy burden of taxation under which they now labor, by the removal of the five per cent. tax, &c.; also, by instituting a drawback of three per cent. per pound on cotton, to be refunded to the manufacturer; also, a drawback on all articles taxed previous to entering into the manufacture of goods, &c.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: The petition from citizens of Lawrence county, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any reduction of the currency.

By Mr. MARVIN: The petition of Darius Moore, William F. Baker, W. A. Smith, Daniel Mackay, and others, citizens of Fulton and Saratoga counties, New York, praying for an appropriation of $1,000 per year for the remainder of his life to Samuel Downing, the only surviving soldier of the American Revolution.

By Mr. MARSTON: The petition of 21 citizens of Ossipee, New Hampshire, praying that no act be passed authorizing a curtailment of the national currency or requiring national banks to redeem their notes in New York.

By Mr. MOULTON: The petition of citizens of Wayne county, Illinois, praying that there be no curtailment of the currency.

By Mr. MCGILGURG: The memorial of Lorenzo Sherwood to Senate and House of Representatives, on the subject of utilizing railway capital.

Also, the petition to Senate and House of Representatives of citizens of Butler, Bates county, Missouri, against curtailment of the national currency.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The memorial of Rev. W. H. Furness, George Cadwallader, Daniel Smith, and others, citizens of Philadelphia, asking that the repeal of the law which retires officers of the Army at a certain age may be considered, and that no retirement may be made without the report of a board of examination.

Also, the petition and accompanying correspondence of Robert A. Parrish, of Philadelphia, praying for relief against the Emperor and Government of France.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of R. Dexter and 55 others of the State of Maine, for the submission to the several States of a proposition for an amendment to the Constitution providing that no inequality shall be recognized among citizens on account of birth, race, or color, and to remove by immediate legislation all such inequalities in the District of Columbia.

Also, the petition of Mrs. Susan Libby, of Maine, for bounty and back pay for the military services of her son.

By Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts: The memorial of harbor commissioners of Massachusetts, for aid in protecting the harbor of Boston from obstructions.

By Mr. WARD: The petition of numerous citizens of Steuben county, New York, in favor of increase of tariff on wool.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Warren, Jo Daviess county, Illinois, asking that no act be passed curtailing the national currency, or compelling all national banks, wherever located, to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances.

By Mr. WENTWORTH: Several petitions concerning the contraction of the currency and resumption of specie payments.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: The petition of cigar manufacturers of Allegheny city, Pennsylvania, praying for an alteration in the tax on domestic cigars.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 10, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. A. D. GILLETTE, D. D., of Washington city.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to dispense with the further reading of the Journal. It is very long, consisting mainly of yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be dispensed with only by the unanimous consent of the Senate. Is there any objection? No objection being made, the further reading of the Journal is dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens and wool-growers of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADE. I have also a memorial from Kennedy O'Brien, a soldier in the late Mexican war, who received injuries in the service by which he was rendered totally blind, and who now has a pension of eight dollars per month. He prays that this pension may be increased, I suppose to correspond with that of other pensioners where it has been increased since. I hope that his prayer will be granted. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of a large number of citizens of Erie county, Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NORTON presented the petition of the officers of the Southern Minnesota Railroad Company, praying for the passage of a law authorizing them to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river opposite the corporate limits of the city of La Crosse; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LANE presented a memorial of journey-men cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars at Fort Wayne, Indiana, praying for a modification of the duty on cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Buffalo, of the Board of Trade of Detroit, and of the Board of Trade of Toledo, in favor of the construction of a ship-canal across the St. Clair flats; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I present a petition numerously signed by farmers and growers of flax in the State of Indiana, praying that the duty on flax-seed may be fixed at not less than thirty cents per bushel. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance, and ask their attention to the subject. My attention has been several times called to the importance of this legislation by persons interested in it in the State of Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I have received a remonstrance which by the action of the Senate yesterday becomes to a certain extent out of place, and yet I feel it my duty to present it. It is the remonstrance of Henry H. Bowman and fifty-eight other colored citizens of Worcester, Massachusetts, against the admission of Nebraska as a State with a constitution which disfranchises citizens on account of color. The question to which these remonstrants address themselves is happily settled for the present in this body; but it may arise hereafter in some other stage, and hence I do not regard this remonstrance as entirely out of place. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I have a petition from citizens of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, in which they ask for an amendment to the Constitution that shall provide against any inequality on account of birth, race, or color, and they also ask for immediate legislation removing any such inequality from the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the ten unrestored States. I ask the reference of this petition to the joint committee on reconstruction.

It was so referred.

Mr. MORGAN presented five petitions from citizens of New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of importers of hardware and cutlery, of New York, remonstrating against the high duties proposed to be levied on those articles by House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented three petitions of citizens of Shoreham, Vermont, and one petition of citizens of Middlebury, Vermont, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of Benjamin Tilley, praying for rent of land occupied by the War Department in Washington city, as the site of a portion of the barracks constituting Camp Fry, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims. There has been an adverse report, but additional evidence is presented.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the surviving heirs of William B. Foster, praying for the adoption of measures to secure to them the amount due from the Government to William B. Foster at the time of his death, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of O. E. Dreutzer, praying for compensation for services rendered as consul of the United States at Bergen, Norway, from the 5th of November, 1865, to the 26th of May, 1866, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Adeline M. Gould, praying for a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 497) granting a pension to Mrs. Adeline M. Gould. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Josephine Slocum, praying for a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 498) granting a pension to Mrs. Josephine Slocum. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 177) to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Maine, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, is not present. I move that these amendments be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

WINONA AND ST. PETERS RAILROAD.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the bill reported by the Committee on Finance for the relief of the Winona and St. Peters Railroad Company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask my friend from Ohio whether that bill will lead to any discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think none at all. I presume the reading of the report will satisfy every Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With that understanding I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 494) for the relief of the Winona and St. Peters Railroad Company was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for refunding to the Winona and St. Peters Railroad Company, in gold, the sum of $3,424 28, being the additional duties paid by them on railroad iron under the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports," approved April 29, 1864.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the memorial of the Winona and Saint Peters Railroad Company, an incorporation of the State of Minnesota, have had the same under consideration, and find that this company imported in the fall of 1863 five hundred tons of railroad iron, which was landed in New York and shipped for Milwaukee, under bond to pay the duty then imposed by law within sixty days, the time allowed for its transit. By the usual course of navigation it should have arrived at Milwaukee that fall; but by the early closing of navigation it was detained at Oswego. It seems from the papers on file that the company made various efforts to pay the duty, both at Milwaukee and New York; but the collector at each port refused to receive the duties while the iron was in transitu. The duty was then $13 50 per ton. Subsequently, by the joint resolution of April 29, 1864, duties on imported goods were increased fifty per cent. for sixty days, thus imposing a duty on this iron of $21 25 per ton, while by the general tariff act, which took effect July 1, 1864, the duty on railroad iron was sixty cents per hundred pounds, or $13 44 per ton. The iron arrived at Milwaukee on the 21st of June, 1864, and, in addition to the duty imposed by law when the iron arrived in New York, there was imposed an additional duty under the joint resolution of the sum of $3,424 20, which sum was paid by the petitioners under protest.

Your committee are of opinion that the additional duty provided for by the joint resolution of April 29, 1864, was not applicable to goods actually in transitu within the United States and under bonds providing for the payment of the specific rate of duty then imposed by law. At all events, your committee think it inequitable upon the facts stated to exact the increased duty when the importation was complete before the passage of the joint resolution, and when parties interested had tendered the duties imposed by law and were guilty of no laches.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the following bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEETINGS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 880, to fix the times for the regular meetings of Congress.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section of the bill provides that in addition to the present regular times of meeting of Congress, there shall be a meeting of the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and of each succeeding Congress thereafter, at twelve o'clock meridian, on the 4th day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected, except that when the 4th of March occurs on Sunday, then the meeting shall take place at the same hour on the next succeeding day.

The second section declares that section seventeen of the act approved July 28, 1866, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," shall be so amended that no Senator or Representative in Congress who has been a member of the Congress next immediately preceding shall receive any allowance for mileage for traveling to the place of meeting to attend such additional session provided for in the preceding section.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend the bill by striking out all of the second section after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That no person who was a member of the previous Congress shall receive any compensation as mileage for going to or returning from the additional session provided for by the foregoing section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire of the Senator who has charge of this bill if the persons elected to the Fortieth Congress will be entitled, under this bill, to mileage for more than one session during that Congress?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly; for each session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Each new member, then, as I understand it, will be entitled to mileage for the session contemplated by this bill on the 4th of March, and then entitled to another mileage when that session may adjourn, and also another mileage for attending the next succeeding session of Congress, and so on. It seems to me that the bill ought to be so amended as to provide that no Senator or Representative shall receive mileage for more than two sessions of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. POLAND. This amendment that is proposed by the committee to the second section of the bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, is no change in substance; it is merely putting it in shorter and, as we thought, in better language. The provision is, that no Senator or Representative who is a member of this Congress shall be entitled to mileage for the session that is to commence immediately on the expiration of this session. What objection there can be to new members, those who are actually obliged to travel in order to get here to attend that session and to return from it, being entitled to mileage for attending that session, is more than I am able to discover. Why, if there be three distinct, separate sessions of Congress in a term, members should not be entitled to mileage for attending each is more than I am able to see. The object of this provision is, that persons who are members of the present Congress and who actually are not obliged to travel in order to reach here or to go home from here, whose actual travel is not increased in consequence of the additional session, shall not receive mileage for that session. The justice of that is apparent; but beyond that I see no force in the objection of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. According to that construction of this bill it will add immensely to the expenses of the Fortieth Congress; and the general understanding is, I think, that the session which is to take place on the 4th of March is to be a session simply for organization. I do not understand that it is contemplated that Congress is to proceed with the transaction of its usual business; but the argument made for the passage of this bill is, that it is desirable to have the Fortieth Congress organized at all times during its term of existence, and the main object of passing this law and providing for a session on the 4th of March is to enable the Fortieth Congress to organize at that time, so that it may be prepared for any emergency that may arise during its existence. I do not know whether the addition of such an immense sum to the ordinary expenses of Congress simply for that purpose will be quite satisfactory to our constituents. I know heretofore Senators have been required to attend the called executive sessions of the Senate without any compensation. On the 4th of March, 1865, I was here to attend an executive session called by a proclamation of the President. I came here from the State of Oregon; I attended that session; but I received no mileage at all; the law does not provide for mileage in such cases; and if that is a just rule which has heretofore existed, I do not see why it should not apply to the Fortieth Congress when it simply convenes, as I understand, more for the purpose of organization than for any other purpose. I am not very particular on the subject; I have no more interest in the question than any one else; but I make the suggestion, and the Senate can do as they please about it.

Mr. POLAND. I am not one of the promoters of this bill; indeed I have taken the charge of it and endeavored to get it on its passage at the solicitation of members of the House of Representatives from those States which do not elect their Representatives until subsequent to the 4th of March; they deem it very important that if the bill is to pass at all it should pass at as early a day as possible; and there is very great force, as I think, in that suggestion. The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the Senator from New York, [Mr. HARRIS.] He is absent; and the chairman of our committee, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] is also absent; and at the solicitation mainly of members of the House of Representatives I have called up the bill at the present time.

I am not aware that it is understood, as the Senator from Oregon says, that the session of Congress which is provided for by this bill to commence on the 4th day of March is to be merely for organization. If the Senator from Oregon so understands it now, I apprehend that if this bill shall pass it will turn out that he labors under some mistake in that regard. What was the precise idea on that point of the framer of this bill, or of the particular friends of this bill who originated it, in the House of Representatives, is more than I know. But, however that may be, whether the session that is provided to be held on the 4th of March be a long one or a short one, I can see no reason in justice why members of either House, either of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, who actually travel from their homes to attend that session, should not be entitled to mileage for their travel as much as for attending any of the sessions of Congress that are provided for by existing law. The argument of the Senator from Oregon on that subject, that it is going to be productive of very great expense, is rather an argument against the passage of the bill than an argument against this section or the amendment the committee have proposed to it, which, as I said before, does not change the character of the bill or the provisions of the bill, but is merely a change of phraseology. If the bill is to pass at all, it seems to me this provision in relation to mileage is entirely just, and is all the limitation that there should be upon this subject of mileage for that session. In regard to those members of the present Congress who are here who are not required to travel in order to attend it, it is very just and right that they should not be allowed mileage; but as to those who actually travel from their homes to attend the session, there is no reason whatever in my judgment why they should not be entitled to their mileage for attending that session as for attending any other session of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not see a great deal of difference between the section which we are asked to strike out and the substitute which it is proposed to insert in lieu of it; but I rise for the purpose of suggesting to those who have an interest in the mileage what may be a matter of some moment to them and according to my view would be unjust. The amendment as well as the original section says that no member of the next Congress shall be entitled to any mileage for attending it on the 4th of March if he was a member of the present Congress, and so in relation to any Congresses that may exist hereafter. Now, let me state a condition of things which I can imagine may often occur. The Senators who are now members of the present Congress may be reelected by their several Legislatures; and there are some of them who are not now here; they are away, I will not say for what purpose; they are at home; and they will have to come here on the 4th of March to attend the session of the next Congress, and if they do they get no mileage.

But another difficulty may occur, supposing that it would not be right to allow them mileage. The Senators who are here now may not be some of them reelected. There is some probability of that in point of fact, I understand; but there are some who may not desire to be reelected. My friend from Indiana [Mr. LANE] is in the latter category; but he may change his mind before the next Congress terminates, and his successor may not be here during the whole continuance of that Congress. Death may lay his hands upon him; he may resign, or the Executive may give him some appointment that may induce him to give up his place in the Senate; and in such a contingency as that the honorable member to whom I allude, now a Senator from Indiana, should be sent here by his State, (and she could send no more worthy member,) he would not be entitled to mileage; so in relation to Senators who may be in the same condition, because the Senators who take their places now may hereafter be appointed to some high office by the Executive. Any one who is now a Senator appointed to the place filled by such a one would get no mileage though he might be obliged to come from the Pacific.

So far I have referred to Senators; but the same remarks are applicable to members of the House of Representatives. It may well happen that members of the present House of Representatives, or rather members of the present Congress to speak more accurately, either because they have not desired a reelection, or because the people were unwilling to reelect them, may not have been elected to the next Congress, but they may be elected by their constituents during the existence of that Congress if a vacancy occurs. A member from Oregon or a member from California may be in that situation; and if the bill passes, if I understand it correctly, he will be entitled to no mileage, because he falls within the description of having been a member of the present Congress.

That would seem to be unjust, provided it be just to allow mileage, and I am sure every Senator is satisfied that that is but just, particularly in relation to the members from the Pacific coast, who have to leave their home, for an entire session, attended with very great expense, first in the coming here, and second in the fact that they surrender all their business, whatever that may be, at home during the entire session of Congress.

I suggest, therefore, to my friend who has charge of this bill, whether it would not be better to provide now for that contingency, very likely to happen, instead of passing the bill in the shape in which it is now presented. I feel that there will be a good deal perhaps of well-founded criticism or censure in the country if we pass the bill in its present shape, I mean the bill calling for the organization of Congress on the 4th of March next, if mileage is to be paid to all who shall attend on the 4th of March. It will cost hundreds of thousands of dollars provided there are members enough of that House who are not members of the present Congress. If we organize on the 4th of March and adjourn, the adjourned session will be really but a continuance of the present session, and one of two things would happen: either that there could be no mileage for coming to the adjourned session, or there would be two mileages. The members who are not now members of Congress, when elected, who shall come here on the 4th of March, will be entitled to mileage, and if they go home, as they would upon an adjournment, and come here, in consequence of an adjournment, on the day before the next annual meeting in December, they will be entitled also to a mileage. I do not think the people would be satisfied with that. I agree therefore with my friend from Oregon that it would be better if we can provide against such large disbursement as the bill would cost if it passes in the shape which it now has.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The necessity of spending the summer here will be regretted, I suppose, by all of us; and I think it is due to the Senate that the Senator who takes charge of this bill should state what is the necessity for this legislation and what is its purpose. During the war, for four or five years, the legislative department certainly was of quite as much importance to the Government as it is now after the war is closed, and it was not thought necessary then by the party in the majority to keep Congress in continuous session. If this is for partisan purposes of course I have nothing to say against it; so far as party policy is concerned; I do not claim the right to interfere with the desires of the majority; but if it relates to the interests of the country and looks to legislation for the interests of the country during the coming summer, I think it is due that we should all know, the country should know, something of the necessity which the friends of this bill believe calls for its passage. I do not know myself. I heard the bill discussed in the committee; but I did not there learn, nor have I learned elsewhere, why, for the first time in the history of the Government a third session is provided for during each Congress. I believe the Government has got along very well holding the regular annual sessions of Congress. I have never known any calamity to come to the country because of the policy that has been adopted and continued for three quarters of a century; I heard of no calamity or misfortune to the Government mentioned during the war because the Congress was not in continuous session; and I should like to know why it is thought necessary to have this additional session hereafter. There can be but this one extraordinary session during the Administration of the present Chief Magistrate. This bill does not provide for just one more session; it is a permanent law if adopted.

Now, sir, unless there is necessity for it, I cannot vote for it. It adds very considerably to the expenses of the Government. In the first place, there is the mileage of all the new members of Congress who come in. Then there is that very large cost to the Government incident to the session of Congress known to every Senator. This proposition makes a large inroad into the Treasury. If it is simply because of party necessities the country ought to know it. If it is to hold the President in check the country ought to know that. If it is to legislate upon the interests of the country, commercially and otherwise, I think the country ought to know that. But if the passage of this bill has been decided elsewhere, where the reasons given for it can never come to the public, there would seem to be a propriety in at least referring to those reasons in this body.

I did not intend to say one word upon this question, but supposed the distinguished Senator from Vermont, who called the bill up, designed to state why this bill is to pass. If it is not considered proper that the country should know anything about it, but if the country is to take it for granted that it is right, the course which the Senator has pursued in bringing the bill to a vote on its passage without any explanation is understood. I make these inquiries simply that we shall know a little about it.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. President, knowing, as my friend the Senator from Indiana does, the circumstances that I have stated as the reasons why I have called up this bill, I think it is hardly fair for him to make his inquiries particularly and specially to me in relation to the reasons for the passage of the bill. The bill is one that originated in the House of Representatives, and I know nothing in relation to the views of those who introduced the bill and who favored it except what I have learned from the published debate on the subject. I have no other means of knowing the designs of the originators and promoters of the bill. But I can state to the Senator from Indiana, so far as I know, the reasons that operated in the House for the passage of this bill, and which are claimed to be ample reasons why it should be adopted and this additional session of Congress be provided for.

We have had a provision made by law ever since the formation of this Government in relation to the succession to the Presidency in case of the death of the President. In the first place, it is provided that the Vice President, in case of the decease of the President shall be his successor. In case the Vice President dies, the next in succession is the President pro tempore of the Senate. In case of his death, he is to be succeeded by the Speaker of the House as the acting President. It has been deemed advisable to make the succession so long as this: that there should be three persons in the line of official succession to the Presidency in case of vacancy by death. It so happens at the present time that the presidential chair is occupied by the person who was elected Vice President. The number is reduced in this way by one. At the expiration of this Congress, on the 4th of March, there will be no Speaker of the House, and, under existing laws, there will be no Speaker elected by the next Congress, until next December, nine months, during which there will be no person holding or exercising the office of Speaker who would be eligible, in consequence of being Speaker, to the presidential chair if all of the persons standing before him should die. This I understand to be one reason, and perhaps the principal reason, which has been urged for the adoption of this measure.

Further than this, the official term of the next Congress commences on the 4th day of March, but there will be no organization of the Congress under existing law, and can be none unless they shall be specially called together by the President, until the December following. Although elected, although in office, there is no way, unless they are called together by a proclamation of the President, by which they can meet and organize until next December. It was deemed wise that there should be a session called at the very beginning of the congressional term that Congress might be in an organized condition.

How much of political significance there may be in reference to this measure; how much it has been called for; how much more it has been thought of in consequence of the unfortunate differences that have existed between different departments of the Government, I do not know. That the state of things which is now existing upon that subject may have had some influence upon this measure I should hardly feel prepared to deny; how much I do not know.

These are, as far as I am able to state to my friend from Indiana, the reasons why this bill is called for.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to inquire of him, as he has investigated the subject, whether the President of the Senate continues after the close of the Congress. Supposing the President of the Senate to be a member of the next Congress, does that President pro tempore continue to be the President of the Senate, under existing laws, during the recess?

Mr. POLAND. That is a question that I have not examined with any care, but my understanding is that he does continue, if he continues to be a member of the Senate, to hold the office of President pro tempore until another shall be elected, and holds it during the vacation as much as he does during the session of Congress. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The country has been twice that I now think of placed in its present position. General Harrison died at an early period of his term; General Taylor also died at rather an early period of his term; and yet the Congress did not think it necessary to have a session such as is provided for in this bill. The Government went on as before. This extraordinary fear from the death of the incumbent of the presidential chair was not felt as it seems now to be felt. But if the Senator be right in his answer to my question, then, sir, there is no difficulty at this session of Congress in providing for the contingency which he suggests as the reason for the passage of this bill. If during the present session of Congress a presiding officer should be elected, he will be the President pro tempore of the Senate during the coming recess; and should there be a vacancy in the presidential office, as I understand from the Senator from Vermont, he would be the person to occupy that high office. Then, sir, there is no difficulty in the Senate providing for the contingency without the passage of this law.

But I did not intend to debate it. We now know the reason which is suggested by the gentleman having the bill in charge; the country knows it. Unquestionably that is the reason that governs him. I think, in view of the fact that the Senate, without the passage of a law, can place the Government in a very secure position so far as the presidential office is concerned; there is no great force in the reason given by the Senator, and I shall not be able to vote for this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON obtained the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. POLAND. I hope we shall be permitted to proceed with this bill. I apprehend it will not take very much time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move to postpone the order of the day?

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator will withdraw that motion and allow the unfinished business of yesterday to lie over informally, I shall not object. I have a bill that I want to come up after this.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us get through with this.

Mr. WADE. I am willing, provided the order of the day is allowed to go over informally.

Mr. JOHNSON. The vote will be taken in a moment. I am not about to discuss the bill; I merely rose to ask a question of the Chair. I wanted to know, for I am ashamed to say I do not know, whether the President pro tempore chosen by the Senate holds over? To apply it to a case which occurs, suppose we elect as President pro tempore, on the last day of the present session, or at any other time, one who is a member of the next Senate, will he not be President pro tempore of the Senate? If so, there will then be two lives which will secure against an interregnum of the presidency—the life of the actual incumbent and the life of the President pro tempore of the Senate. I ask the Chair for information, being better acquainted with it, I am sure, than I am.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The impression of the Chair is, as the Senator from Vermont answered, that the President pro tempore of the body, elected before the close of a session, although that is the close of a Congress, continues, being a member of the body, to be the President pro tempore of the Senate during the vacation. Of course, however, the Chair does not undertake to decide a matter of that sort, except so far as to give his own opinion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; I take it for granted that that is so, although I am not certain. Then the contingency of there being a vacancy in the executive department, in the office of President of the United States, will depend on the death of the present incumbent and the death of the President pro tempore of the Senate during the interval that may elapse between the adjournment of this Congress and the assembling of the next Congress in December, provided we do not pass this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will proceed with this bill unless some one calls for the order of the day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I propose to make an addition to the amendment which the Senate has already adopted to the second section of the bill. The amendment as adopted by the Senate is—

That no person who was a member of the previous Congress shall receive any compensation as mileage for going to or returning from the additional session provided for by the foregoing section.

I propose to add to that these words:

Unless there be a recess in such session for more than thirty days, in which case the members of the former Congress shall receive mileage.

That is to provide for the travel in case there should be that extended recess. The amendment which the Senate has adopted is based upon the idea that the Senators of this Congress who shall be members of the next Congress will be here at the adjournment, and they will in fact do no traveling, and that any mileage paid to them would be what has been heretofore known as constructive mileage. I do not think that mileage should be paid. The provision of the section is well enough; but suppose there be a recess during the next session of Congress of more than thirty days, then in fact the members will have to travel to their homes and return again to meet the Congress, or else remain here all the time, which they probably would not do. I offer this amendment because I believe this bill is to result in a continuous session of Congress after the 4th of March, with recesses. That is my opinion of it. I look for recesses in the next session of Congress, and that members will have to travel back and forward to their homes; and if they do travel in fact, and that travel is made necessary by this law and by the action of Congress in taking recesses, it is right that they should have the mileage.

Mr. POLAND. I do not see any necessity or any propriety in having this provision in relation to the session of Congress provided for by this bill any more than in relation to any other session of Congress; nor do I see any reason why that amendment should apply to this additional session of Congress that we create by this bill any more than it should apply to the recess we have had over the Christmas holidays, the ordinary recess which is usually had at the sessions of Congress that are now provided for.

As to this fear that is intimated by the Senator from Indiana, that the ordinary vacation from the 4th of March to December is to be filled up by a continuous number of recesses, that that is the object of this bill, that it is a mere entering wedge to bring that about, I think nothing would be wanting to make that so but the adoption of the Senator's amendment. If the members of Congress are to be paid a mileage for as many recesses as they can take from the 4th of March up to December, I apprehend it may turn out, as the Senator from Indiana fears, that the time will be filled up in that way. I think that the way to prevent what he fears is to keep off his amendment; not adopt it; leave the bill to stand as it is.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I wish to say that the purpose I have in offering this amendment is to prevent such recesses. I believe it will become a vicious practice, and if the members of Congress know that it is to throw upon the Treasury additional cost they will be likely to go on and complete their business and adjourn as Congresses have heretofore done.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. President, the effect of this amendment seems to be different in the mind of the Senator to what it is in my own. I think the very danger that he apprehends of recesses will be promoted by providing that the members of both Houses of Congress shall be paid for them provided they have them. This fear that will be entertained, as the Senator says, by members of getting money out of the Treasury is one that I have usually noticed does not prevail to any great extent when the money that comes out of the Treasury is going into their own pockets.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. BUCKALEW and Mr. RIDDLE called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Williams—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, and Saulsbury—7.
ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cattell, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Harris, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Pomerooy, Ross, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—19.

So the bill was passed.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday, the bill (H. R. No. 508) to amend the organic acts of the Territories of Nebraska, Colorado, Dakota, Montana, Washington, Idaho, Arizona, Utah, and New Mexico is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the question pending being on the amendment offered yesterday by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WADE. If it is in order I desire to present a substitute for that amendment. I offered an amendment yesterday upon which no vote was taken, and I presume, therefore, I am at liberty now to withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly. Mr. WADE. Then, instead of that amendment, I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That from and after the passage of this act there shall be no denial of the elective franchise in any of the Territories of the United States to any citizen thereof on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and all acts or part of acts, either of Congress or of the Legislative Assemblies of said Territories, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby declared null and void.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should now like to hear the whole bill read.

Mr. WADE. The whole of the House bill was stricken out, and the amendment I have just offered inserted. That is all there is in the bill now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I am content.

The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe that there is but one section in the bill now. I wish to hear it read.

The Secretary read the bill as amended.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Territories whether that will cover any case of future legislation by the Territories; whether that is his understanding. Suppose some Territory hereafter to be created should enact a law prohibiting colored persons from voting, would the prohibition of the present bill apply?

Mr. WADE. I do not know but that it would. It certainly refers to all the Territories now in existence, and it can be readily amended to cover all others that there may be hereafter.

Mr. HOWARD. I think it had better be amended so as to apply to all future Territories.

Mr. HOWE. I think there is no doubt that it covers all the Territories.

Mr. HOWARD. Perhaps it may cover every future case; but that may not be the interpretation given to it, and I wish to make it certain.

Mr. GRIMES. All the country we have got is included in some Territory or other.

Mr. WADE. I thought when I drew the provision it would cover all the Territories we have, and I think the provision is well enough as it is; but if the Senator from Michigan wants to amend it I have no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. I suggest that it be amended so as to be applicable to any future Territory that may be erected by Congress.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I propose to amend the bill by inserting at the end of it this clause:

And the provisions of this act shall be applicable to all Territories which are now or may hereafter be organized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that the end proposed by the Senator can be accomplished by inserting a word or two in the first line of the amendment instead of by the addition which he proposes.

Mr. HOWARD: If it can be accomplished in that way that will be just as well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill as it now stands reads:

That from and after the passage of this act there shall be no denial of the elective franchise in any of the Territories of the United States to any citizen thereof on account of race, color, or previous servitude; and all acts or parts of acts, either of Congress or the Legislative Assemblies of said Territories, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby declared null and void.

I think that provision applies to all Territories that may be hereafter organized; but by inserting after the words "Territories of the United States" the words "now or hereafter to be organized" the point will be made a positive certainty.

Mr. HOWARD. Does not the amendment which I suggested cover every possible case? I think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That provision will cover all possible cases; but it would add very much to the symmetry of the bill to insert the words I have suggested at the place named, instead of attaching a provision of such length to the end of the bill, reciting, in fact, a considerable portion of the preceding provision.

Mr. WADE. I think it would read better if it said simply "Territories now or hereafter to be organized."

Mr. HOWARD. That is the idea I have, and I will modify my amendment in the way suggested by the Senator from Oregon, by inserting the words "now or hereafter to be organized" after the words "Territories of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. WADE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Connors, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Willey, and Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Hendricks, Johnson, Patterson, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cattell, Chandler, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Harris, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—21.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill to regulate the elective franchise in the Territories of the United States."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY subsequently said: I happened accidentally to be out of the Chamber when the vote was taken on the bill regulating suffrage in the Territories. I should like to have my vote recorded in the affirmative on the passage of the bill if it is allowable under the rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) It is not allowable, under the rule, under any circumstances.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I merely wish to state that if I had been present I should have voted in the affirmative.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution of the Senate No. 151, appropriating money to defray the expenses of the joint select committee on retrenchment.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 956) to enforce the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 964) in regard to the compensation of route agents in the Post Office Department; and cure a site for a building to accommodate the post office and United States courts in New York city.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 229) to pro-

TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 453) to regulate the tenure of offices.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. As originally introduced by Mr. WILLIAMS, it provided that every person, excepting heads of Departments, holding any office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person hereafter appointed in the same manner to any office, who shall become duly qualified therefor, should be entitled to hold office until a successor should be in like manner appointed and duly qualified, unless otherwise provided by law; and that when any officer thus appointed, excepting judges of the United States courts, should during the recess of the Senate be guilty of misconduct in office, or for any reason become unable to perform its duties, in that case, and in no other, the President might appoint a person to fill the office by granting to him a commission, to expire at the end of the next session of the Senate, the evidence and reasons for the action of the President in such case to be in writing, and filed in the proper Department for inspection. It was also provided that the President should also have power in like manner to fill all offices not before filled, and all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by death, resignation, or expiration of term, and not otherwise; but no appointment shall be made without the advice and consent of the Senate to any office filled after the session of the Senate at which the temporary commission shall expire. But these provisions were not to apply to or interfere with any rules made by Congress for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

The bill, having been referred to the joint select committee on retrenchment, was reported back with an amendment proposing to strike all out after the enacting clause and in lieu of the words struck out to insert:

That every person (excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General) holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any officer appointed as aforesaid, excepting judges of the United States courts, and excepting those specially excepted in section one of this act, shall, during a recess of the Senate, be shown, by evidence satisfactory to the President, to be guilty of misconduct in office or crime, or for any reason shall become legally disqualified or incapable to perform its duties, in such case, and in no other, the President may suspend such officer and designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate, and until the case shall be acted upon by the Senate; and in such case it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the first day of such next meeting of the Senate, to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case and the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of such office. And if the Senate shall concur in such suspension and advise and consent to the removal of such officer they shall so certify to the President, who may thereupon remove such officer, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint another person to such office. But if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension, such officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office, and the powers of the person so performing its duties in his stead shall cease; and the official salary and emoluments of such officer shall, during such suspension, belong to the person so performing the duties thereof, and not to the officer so suspended: Provided, however, That the President, in case he shall become satisfied that such suspension was made on insufficient grounds, shall be authorized, at any time before reporting such suspension to the Senate as above provided, to revoke such suspension and reinstate such officer in the performance of the duties of his office.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President shall have power to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate by reason of death, resignation, expiration of term of office, or other lawful cause, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session thereafter. And if no appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall be made to such office so vacant or temporarily filled as aforesaid, during such next session of the Senate, such office shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto until the same shall be filled by appointment thereto by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and during such time all the powers and duties belonging to such office shall be exercised by such other officer as may by law exercise such powers and duties in case of a vacancy in such office.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend the term of any office the duration of which is limited by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the second section of the amendment of the committee by inserting after the word "become," in the sixth line of the section, the words "incapable or," and by striking out in the seventh line the words "or incapable." This is a mere verbal transposition to make the sections more precisely clear.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made as a clerical correction, no objection being interposed.

Mr. HOWE. Is the question now on adopting the amendment reported by the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HOWE. I have a single suggestion to make to the Senate, and that is as to the propriety of excepting from the operations of this law, or proposed law, the heads of Departments. I know of no reason in the world why they should be made an exception. If I am not mistaken, each one of those offices is created by statute, and created not for the personal benefit of the Executive or the head of the executive government, but created for the benefit of the public service just as much as a deputy postmaster, just as much as an Indian agent, just as much as any other officer. The tenure of their several offices should be under the control of law, and they should be independent of any undue exercise of executive influence or other influence just as much as any other officer, it seems to me. I suppose the committee had some reason for making that exception, and I should really like to hear what it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state with pleasure, so far as I understand it, the reason; and I believe I comprehend the views of the committee on that point. We do not doubt what my friend from Wisconsin has said, that these heads of Departments are public officers, who are responsible to the public, and in whose faithful administration the public have just as much interest as they have in that of any other officer. That is all true; but it did seem to the committee, after a great deal of consultation and reflection, that it was right and just that the Chief Executive of the nation in selecting these named Secretaries, who, by law and by the practice of the country, and officers analogous to whom by the practice of all other countries, are the confidential advisers of the Executive respecting the administration of all his Departments, should be persons who were personally agreeable to him, in whom he could place entire confidence and reliance, and that whenever it should seem to him that the state of relations between him and any of them had become so as to render this relation of confidence and trust and personal esteem inharmful, he should in such case be allowed to dispense with the services of that officer in vacation and have some other person act in his stead. We thought that so much discretion, so much confidence, so much respect ought to be properly attributed to the Chief Magistrate of the nation. It may happen that at some particular time—some people may suppose that it has happened now—the Chief Magistrate for the time being ought not to be invested with such powers; but the committee have recommended the adoption of this rule respecting the tenure of officers as a permanent and systematic and as they believe an appropriate regulation of the Government for all Administrations and for all time; and it did appear to them (whether the reason may commend itself to the Senate or not) that it was just to the Executive, and on the whole best for the interest of the nation, that he should be allowed during a recess of the Senate to change his confidential advisers if it should appear to him to be fit, subject to that general responsibility which every officer must be held to to the public and to the Senate when they meet again. That was the reason of the committee.

Mr. HOWE. Well, Mr. President, I am bound to say that the reason is not satisfactory to me. I supposed, as the Senator from Vermont has remarked, that this was not a temporary expedient, but a measure proposed for the government of the country hereafter; and in that view of the bill I do insist for one that these officers should be placed upon the footing of all other employes of the Government. They differ only in grade from other officers who are not included in the exception. They are of more importance to the public service than any other of those officers to whom the bill has reference, and because they are of so much more importance I think the reason is just so much stronger why the tenure of their offices should be regulated by law.

The Senator calls them the confidential advisers of the President. Now, I deny to them all right to that designation. I do not concede that they are the confidential advisers of the President, or at least that the law contemplates that they should be; that such is the purpose of their creation. They are the servants of the country; they are placed there for the benefit of the people; and it is no more necessary that they should be on confidential terms with the President than that they should be on confidential terms with the representatives of the people. It is very true it may happen at some juncture that the head of a Department may be on unfriendly terms with the head of the executive department; it may make their personal intercourse disagreeable to one or the other; but such contingencies happen in the administration of public affairs in other countries. I believe no attention is paid to the question whether a minister of Great Britain is personally agreeable or disagreeable to the sovereign. He is put in office because he is agreeable to the people, and he holds office no longer than he is agreeable to the representatives of the people; and whatever may be the personal inclinations of the sovereign he leaves office whenever he proves dissatisfactory to the people. I know of no reason why American law should be more careful of the personal feelings of the President of the United States or less careful of the wishes of the people of the United States than British law should be of the personal feelings of their sovereign or of the wishes of the people of Great Britain. We supposed our institutions were as dependent upon the pleasure of the people as those of Great Britain. I hope they are to continue even more so; but it does look to me as if the exception which it is proposed to insert in this bill is to make the executive officers less responsible to the people and the administration of the Government than is the administration of the British Government.

For these reasons I move to strike out the words included within parentheses in the first section of the amendment of the committee. The words which I propose to strike out are "excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General."

Mr. BUCKALEW. The committee did not change this feature of the bill. The particular provision in the amendment now moved to be stricken out is similar to that contained in the bill which was referred to them. Now, sir, I should like to ask the Senator who last spoke whether in a case which I will mention to him he would be content that the President should not possess the power of changing his Cabinet. At one time during the presidency of General Jackson it is known that difficulties arose between him and the Vice President, a political quarrel which went into the politics of the country. There were certain members of the President's Cabinet who adhered politically in that dispute to the Vice President, who presided in this Chamber, and who for a time was in accord with the political majority here. Under such a provision of law as the Senator proposes, it would have been possible for the Vice President of the United States, acting in concert with a majority of the Senate, to rule the President, and to contend with the President in his own Cabinet to have men there to distract his councils, and, so far as their voices could go, to dictate his policy. I refer back to a well-known historical case by which to test the Senator's views of this particular provision in the amendment. And now, sir, seriously I ask him whether in that emergency in our public history, when the case which I have described was one of actual fact in this Government, he would have had the head of the executive department hampered and annoyed and worried and opposed by political enemies in his Cabinet, held there by a political opposition in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. In precisely the case which the Senator from Pennsylvania has referred us to I do not hesitate to say that I would not allow the President of the United States to remove the members of the Cabinet, the heads of Departments. If they were not in accord with the President, it does not follow that they were not in accord with some other department of the Government; it does not follow that they were not in accord with the people. The Senator calls the Cabinet the President's "own Cabinet." We are at issue upon the propriety of that exact term. I deny that the Cabinet is the President's Cabinet, that it was intended so to be by law, that it ought so to be in fact. It is the Cabinet of the people. Its members are to serve the people, and every duty prescribed to each one of those officers is prescribed by law; and there is no duty prescribed by law to any one of them that they may not execute just as faithfully and just as ably when not in accord with the President as when in accord with the President; and, unless I am greatly mistaken, there is no duty devolved by the Constitution or by law upon the President that he may not discharge just as well, whether his Secretary of State or his Secretary of the Treasury or any other member of the ministry or all other members of the ministry disagree with him or not. The duties which are confided to him by the Constitution are few, and in the discharge of those duties he can neither be controlled nor obstructed by any minister. It is to enable him to exert powers and influences not given to him by the Constitution or by law that it is thought to be essential that he should have control of the tenure of these heads of Departments; and it is precisely because you cannot give him control of the terms of these officers, without giving him powers and influences which the Constitution never designed that he should have, that I object to leaving that control in his hands.

Mr. President, I do not say this at all with reference to the present condition of affairs. Let who may be President at any time hereafter, I still insist that this is the sound rule of interpretation, and ought to be enforced.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, when I spoke of a feeling of accord between the President and any of his Secretaries, I was not speaking of political agreement. I can readily conceive, as is suggested by my friend from Wisconsin, that if the President of the United States happened to be a Republican and my friend from Wisconsin was his principal Secretary of the Treasury, happening to be a Democrat—and I do not mean to make any offensive illustration—

Mr. HOWE. Well, change it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can readily enough conceive that in such a case that would be no reason why the affairs of the Treasury should not go on with regularity, symmetry, and propriety, without any difficulty between those gentlemen. But I was speaking not of political sympathy, but of matters of harmony and similarity of views respecting the administration of the Department itself; because we all know that although all these Departments are executive, and although the Chief Magistrate is himself nothing but the executor of the laws which we make, yet in the course of the administration of affairs questions arise continually which require judgment, which require tact, which require cooperation between the different Departments of the Government.

Now, then, in order to reach that harmony and that cooperation, I think it is fit that the Chief Executive Magistrate, who is responsible to us in a greater degree than any of his subordinates, should be allowed, if a difference of opinion respecting the administration of a particular Department for which he is responsible as the Chief Executive should arise between himself and his Secretary, during a recess of the Senate, to dispense with the services of that man and select some other; because if he be not thus allowed, when Congress comes to meet again and we find that the law has failed of execution, and that derangement and trouble has come upon the administration of public affairs, whom are we to reproach? If we say to the President, "You by the Constitution are the head, and you are responsible that this law should have been executed according to our will," his reply will be, "Very well; but this Secretary whom I selected and whom you agreed to turned out to be entirely incapable to perform these duties; and while I could not charge him with any specific crime or specific legal incapacity to perform the duties provided for by law, yet he was so generally incompetent that the affairs of that Department could not be administered; now blame yourselves, not me." I think we ought to hold the executive department of the Government to a full and rigorous and vigorous performance and execution of every law that we pass; and to do that freely and fully and fairly I think we ought to give him the little discretion which we do give him by merely allowing him in our absence to change, if he pleases, four or five officers who by all prescription and all custom and all practice are regarded, and are, in fact, his confidential, and necessarily confidential, advisers.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, let me add one word. The very case which the Senator from Vermont supposes is provided for in this second section. He supposes the case of the head of a Department who becomes not criminal, but simply incapable to discharge the duties of his office. The second section of this very amendment provides that in that case the President may suspend his functions and lay the fact of incapability before the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I prepared the original bill in this case, which contains in different words the exception contained in the amendment reported by the committee. I do not regard the exception as of any great practical consequence, because I suppose if the President and any head of a Department should disagree so as to make their relations unpleasant, and the President should signify a desire that that head of Department should retire from the Cabinet, that would follow without any positive act of removal on the part of the President. I do not think that in many cases which have occurred the President has peremptorily removed any member of the Cabinet; but I understand the usual practice is, if the President desires to dispense with any head of a Department and to substitute another for him, to signify in some way his desire that there should be a vacancy in the office, and the office, when it becomes vacant by resignation, is filled by the President according to his own wishes and views.

The power under this amendment of the committee is preserved in the Senate, as it exists at this time. During the recess of the Senate under this amendment the President may remove one of the heads of the Departments and he may temporarily appoint some person to fill the vacancy; but I understand that at the next session of the Senate he is bound to make an appointment, as he now is, and that such appointment must be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, so that this simply empowers the President, in case he should deem it necessary to remove a Cabinet officer, to fill the vacancy which is in that way effected during the recess of the Senate. The heads of the Departments are a part of the executive power of the country. According to the theory of the Constitution the executive power is vested in the President of the United States, and these heads of Departments are subordinate officers of the President, immediately under his supervision. They are persons under his immediate direction, except so far as their specific duties may be prescribed by law. But the President consults with these heads of Departments as to all measures of his administration. They are regarded as his confidential advisers; and certainly the law which creates that relation between the President and the heads of those Departments contemplates that there shall be a state of harmony between all of them; that there shall not be a state of war in the executive department of the Government; that it shall not be divided against itself; but that the subordinates or the heads of the different Departments shall be in harmony or practical agreement with the President by whom they are appointed.

The chief reason that influenced me to make the exception was, that I thought something was due to the President of the United States—to that office. This bill undertakes to reverse what has heretofore been the admitted practice of the Government; and it seemed to me that it was due to the exalted office of the President of the United States, the Chief Magistrate of the nation, that he should exercise this power; that he should be left to choose his own Cabinet, and that he should be held responsible, as he will be, to the country for whatever acts that Cabinet may perform.

It is well understood that these heads of Departments are not held directly responsible for the acts of the Administration; but the President is made responsible, because in regard to any and every act which they do that is not prescribed by law he is considered as the person who controls the act. It is under his direction; he is the man who exercises the will. They cannot act, as I understand, contrary to his will without empowering him at this time to remove them from office and place some other person in their office who will act in accordance with his views of public policy. I know that there is room for disagreement of opinion; but it seemed to me that if we revolutionize the practice of the Government in all other respects, we might let this power remain in the hands of the President of the United States; that we ought not to strip him of this power, which is one that it seems to me it is necessary and reasonable that he should exercise.

Mr. FOGG. If the Senator from Oregon will permit me, I would ask him if he believes that the President of the United States can be impeached for any act of any member of his Cabinet unless that act is directed personally by himself. For instance, supposing the Secretary of War shall have given an order which shall be held to be unconstitutional and violative of the rights of the State authorities or of the people of a State, and he shall have given that order without consulting the President, cannot that Secretary, and would not that Secretary be impeached, and would it be possible to impeach the President for such an act?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not suppose that the President of the United States could be impeached for an act performed by any officer when he was personally ignorant of the performance of that act. Of course it would be necessary to produce some evidence of his complicity in the commission of the crime. But let me put a case to the Senator: take the condition of the country during the late war; suppose the orders of the President of the United States, upon whom devolved the responsibility of the prosecution of that war, who is made by the Constitution Commander-in-Chief of the armies, and is therefore responsible to the country, had been disobeyed by the Secretary of War; and suppose the Secretary of War had set up an independent government, if I may so express myself, and undertaken to manage the armies of the United States without any respect to the wishes of the President; then there would have been a difficulty at once; the efficiency of the Administration would have been practically destroyed.

Mr. HOWE. The President could suspend him under the second section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That suggestion is sufficient, it seems to me, to answer the argument made by the Senator from Wisconsin, for under this amendment if any member of the Cabinet becomes incapable or incompetent or corrupt he may be suspended by the President of the United States. Now, if he may be suspended, if he may be temporarily removed and another man put in his place to discharge the duties of the position until the next session of the Senate, why not let the President remove him?

Mr. HOWE. Why not in all cases?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I claim that this power on the part of the President is one that he ought to be allowed to exercise out of some respect to his office—to the office which he occupies—because these men occupy positions in reference to the President which no other officers of the Government do occupy. Their relations with the President are more intimate and confidential than the relations of any other officers in the Government. This may be an argument entitled to no consideration in the judgment, perhaps, of the Senate; but I think, notwithstanding the office may not be administered as it ought to be; it is well enough for the American people to maintain some little respect for the office of President of the United States, to attach to it some little consequence, to suppose that it is possessed of some little dignity, and that the man who is made Chief Magistrate of the United States by the people can be intrusted with some little share of power, enough, at any rate, to make the office respectable. It was upon that ground chiefly that this exception was made. I am not very particular about it, but it appears that it should be made in view of the practice of the Government and the practice of the Senate. I am not as well advised in regard to the practice of the Senate as others here, but I understand that as a matter of courtesy the Senate generally confirms any man whom the President may designate as the head of a Department. There may have been exceptions, but the Senate has generally acquiesced in the right of the President of the United States to choose the members of his own Cabinet; and as that has been the practice, and as it has been acquiesced in by the Senate, it did not occur to me that there were any very good or substantial reasons for changing it as we have provided in the other portions of the amendment of the committee for the other officers under the Government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Constitution imposes upon the President of the United States the duty of executing the laws; it does not impose that duty upon the Secretaries. They are creatures of the law and not of the Constitution directly. Some, and perhaps the greater part, of their functions are as advisers of the President and to aid him in executing the laws in their several Departments. There are some duties that are specifically conferred upon them by Congress. Their relation to the President, as has been well said by gentlemen, is that mostly of confidential advisers. With the exception of the particular duties imposed upon them by law, and on the Secretary of the Treasury more than on the others, they do nothing of their own notion, but act by order of the President in discharging the particular duties of their office.

Standing in that relation to him, as his aids, his confidential advisers, the men upon whom he relies for advice in the first place and for aid in carrying out what is determined to be best in the second, their connection with him is a very peculiar one. It is very important as a general principle unquestionably, as all gentlemen here will admit, that that relation should be a harmonious relation throughout; and, if we may trust to what we have heard, it is not many years since it was considered by the great majority of the Senate a sufficient reason for wishing that the Cabinet should be changed in some degree, because there was the want of that harmony among themselves, and consequently, perhaps, with the President, that was desirable.

That being the peculiar condition of affairs, it has always been considered since the foundation of the Government, as a matter of course, as a general rule—there may have been one or two exceptions, and I think there have been, but I am not very positive on that point—that the President might select such persons as he pleased to be members of his Cabinet. Of course the confirmation of the Senate is necessary; but the general idea of the Senate has been, whether they liked the men or not, to confirm them without any difficulty, because in executing the great and varied interests of this great country it is exceedingly important that there should be the utmost harmony between those who are charged with that execution.

Now, if we reflect a moment we shall see that the matters upon which Congress and the President differ are not apt to be, even in a case of difference of political views, very extensive. There are some matters that are important, some that are peculiar, those relating to the views of a particular party organization and the principles upon which that party wish to conduct the affairs of Government; but after all, the great business of Government in its innumerable details goes far beyond any question of that kind, and is not such as parties would differ upon. They would differ as to the men to hold office, perhaps, and the particular principles upon which particular things should be done; but the ordinary execution of the laws involving the transaction of the great business of the country is a matter upon which all parties agree, wishing only that the laws should be honestly executed and that there should be no corruption.

It seems to me very obvious that with reference to the transaction of business which is peculiarly executive, the confidential advisers that we put about the President should always be men who for the greater part are satisfactory to him. You cannot find a President and a Cabinet who would agree upon all matters of opinion even in important questions. You cannot find eight men probably who agree on everything, even on important matters involving the performance of the duties of the Government; and if you find a man in the Cabinet of the President of the United States, if it be possible that there is one there, who agrees with the President always and thinks just as he does and makes it a point to echo his sentiments, he is probably a man who is not fit to be there and who got there by a mere misapprehension, and stays because he is precisely of that character.

Mr. JOHNSON. He ought not to be there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And he ought not to be there at all.

Mr. CONNESS. There have not been any such for some time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not mean to say whether there are such men or not; but I say it is exceedingly important that there should be a cordiality of feeling and an agreement upon important matters of State policy and State conduct between the President and those who are his confidential advisers. The President naturally would not want a man in his councils who was unfriendly to him, upon whose discretion he could not rely in the first place, and upon whose good faith in keeping the secrets of the executive government he could not rely in the second place; and if he was unfriendly the President might naturally be in fear of consulting him and taking his advice.

A man who is the head of a Department naturally wants the control of that Department. He wants the control of his subordinates, that they should be subject to him and that he should have the power to remove them from office in case they are insubordinate and are such as he cannot comfortably get along with, and to remove them upon the instant, at the moment if it be necessary. In my judgment, in order to the good and proper administration of a Department it is necessary that that power should exist in the head of it, and quite as necessary that the power should exist in the President with reference to the few men who are placed about him to share his councils, be his friends and his agents.

As my friend from Oregon has said, I do not think we are treating the office of President with very great respect when we say that he shall not, in the recess of Congress, remove a Cabinet officer if he deems it necessary. I cannot suppose a case where any man who is on bad terms with the President, who knows that he is, and who knows that the President desires to get rid of him and has no confidence in him, would stay there unless he was controlled by a sense of overruling public duty in a very dangerous and peculiar time. Naturally every man fit to be a member of the Cabinet would feel precisely in that way.

Then, sir, under these circumstances, my opinion agrees entirely with that of the honorable Senator from Vermont and the honorable Senator from Oregon and the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, that it is carrying the matter too far to say that in the long recess of Congress, which usually takes place between the 4th of March and the first Monday of December every second year, the President shall have no power, if he deems it necessary, to change his advisers. Of course under the Constitution he must send the name of whoever he appoints to the Senate afterward for the Senate to act upon, because the Constitution has very wisely provided that we shall have a voice in the appointment of all officers except those who may be designated by law as inferior officers. I hope, therefore, that this exception may be made, as well with reference to what I think is due to the office itself and the peculiar relations the heads of the Departments hold to the President as to what has been the uniform and universal custom in consideration of the ordinary courtesy due to the President of the United States on such matters.

It is a subject of regret to me that it becomes necessary to legislate at all upon this subject of the removal of officers. Under ordinary circumstances I would be opposed to such legislation. I believe my friends thought I was rather slow when I opposed some time ago the putting of an amendment of this nature upon one of the appropriation bills. I stated at that time, and if my recollection does not fail me the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] expressed his entire assent, that I thought action would be required on our part if the President should go so far as to disregard the power of the Senate; that is to say, if he sent a nomination to the Senate and that nomination should be rejected or not confirmed, and then after the Senate adjourned he should appoint the same man again, and that should be recognized as the practice, the result would be that the Senate would lose entirely the power conferred upon it by the Constitution to have a voice in the appointment of officers, because it is very easy to omit sending a man's name to the Senate until the close of the session, and then when he is rejected to appoint him the next day after the adjournment of Congress, and so on from time to time, and in that way the Senate becomes nothing, is merely nullified. I stated at that time that if there should be an attempt to do anything of that sort I would be in favor of limiting the power of the President so far as we could limit it by law in reference to that matter, because in my judgment such a course, if not a direct violation of the Constitution, was a disregard of that respect which was due to the Senate and the constitutional power of the Senate to act upon the appointments of officers; and if I am not very much mistaken the honorable Senator from Maryland said that that would be a decided outrage upon the Constitution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I say so still.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And he says so now. Well, sir, I think it cannot be denied that there is occasion to exercise our own discretion in this regard. I believe there have been several instances, I know there have been some in my own State, in which men sent to this body for confirmation for particular offices and rejected by the body were reappointed immediately after the adjournment of Congress to the offices to which they had been before appointed and rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. There are a great number of cases of that kind.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I presume there are a great number of such cases. The contingency, therefore, has arisen in which I said I should be in favor of legislating on that matter. I would not have been under other circumstances; that is to say, I think I should not have been, because all these things or many of them are the fortunes of war; and if we happen to differ from the President we must remember that he has the appointing power; he is the man to appoint officers, and I do not wish to limit in any way the exercise of that constitutional power. I do not wish to do anything to prohibit his performing all the functions which the Constitution says he shall have a right to perform. Because of one unfortunate condition of affairs I would not disturb the constitutional relations of the different parts of this Government to each other. I think it unwise, simply on a contingency which has arisen that is unpleasant to us, to set a precedent that may be bad and perhaps fatal in the ordinary conduct of affairs hereafter. But in this particular case it seems now to be admitted that the contingency has arisen and that Congress is bound in some way to provide that the constitutional power of the Senate to advise and consent in the nomination of officers nominated by the President shall be respected. That being the case, this bill or something like it is unquestionably properly before the Senate.

I have said thus much to explain the position which I occupy, and intend to occupy, with reference to this question. I mean in some mode to favor such legislation as will protect the body of which I am a member in the enjoyment of every constitutional privilege which belongs to us. I am not for trenching upon the rights of others, but I am for protecting our own; and I am very glad to find that the honorable Senator from Maryland agrees with me in the view that I have stated.

But, sir, perhaps this is traveling a little out of the particular question raised by the amendment of my friend from Wisconsin, who moves to strike out this exception. Repeating, therefore, simply that I consider that the exception ought to stand, for the reasons given by my friend from Oregon particularly, as well as those given by others, I shall make no further remarks on the subject.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, if it were the fact that leaving this much of patronage in the hands of the President would have the effect to increase the respect of the American people for the office, I do not know but that I should be induced to assent to the exception here proposed; but I have not found that the respect of the American people for that high office was very much affected by the way he handled the patronage in his hands.

My observation has been that just as soon as the President turned aside from the discharge of the great public duties devolved upon him by the Constitution and laws, and devoted himself to the work of peddling offices, just that moment the respect of the American people for the office began to abate, and it continued to abate as long as he continued in those employments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not for the office, but for the officer.

Mr. HOWE. "For the officer," says my friend from Vermont, and for the office, which is inevitably affected by the character of the incumbent; and no high office, I do not care how exalted it may be, can be filled by an unworthy incumbent without suffering somewhat in public estimation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator if he supposes the present incumbent is to remain there always?

Mr. HOWE. I am not debating this bill, Mr. President, with the slightest reference to the person of the present incumbent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will excuse me; he is just putting it precisely upon that ground, speaking of this President, as an argument, peddling offices.

Mr. HOWE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I made no allusion to the present President of the United States in the world. I do not undertake to say that the present President of the United States has not indulged somewhat in that habit which I call peddling offices; but I am very far from saying that he is the first one or the worst one who has done it. It is long since that became rather too much the habit of American Executives.

Mr. President, if I am not mistaken, the historical fact is that this question of the power of the President over appointments to and removals from office arose in the course of a debate in one of the earliest Congresses—during the first or second, I do not remember which.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The first.

Mr. HOWE. I think very likely the Senator from Pennsylvania is correct; and it arose upon the propriety of giving the President the power to remove the Secretary of State, a Cabinet officer. General Washington was then President. Mr. Madison, for whom I have that respect, in whose opinions I have that confidence, that I cherish for but very few of the public men this country has produced, then, as I think, animated to a great extent by the confidence he had in the then incumbent of the office, by the anticipation with which he flattered himself that men of less of character or less of probity never would be entrusted with influence, then insisted that it was more convenient that this power of removal should be left in the hands of the President.

It was, if I remember the course of that debate, not then suggested by any one that there were reasons for giving him control over the person or over the term of the Secretary of State that he should not have over a postmaster or over any other officer; but it was contemplated by those who advocated that power then that the President should have the right to remove at any time all officers appointed by himself and confirmed by the Senate. Mr. Madison said, however, in the course of that debate and repeated it, that if the presidential office did fall into the hands of a man who would remove an officer faithfully devoted to the discharge of his duties because he did not like his political opinions, that would be just ground of impeachment; and he undoubtedly believed that the representatives of the American people would always be prepared to resent such an act of power by enforcing the remedy which he thought plain. I think we have already learned that impeachment cannot be relied upon to redress such a wrong as that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Wisconsin is a little mistaken in defining the position of Mr. Madison in the debate to which he has alluded; and it is due to justice and to the respect we owe to history that he should be corrected I think on that point. Mr. Madison at the end of the debate had reasoned himself or excited himself to the conclusion that Congress had no power over the subject of removals; that the Constitution invested in the President of the United States the power to remove, independent of the will of the Senate. At the opening of the debate Mr. Madison seemed to treat it as a question of expediency whether the law should repose that trust in the President or not; but truth compels us to admit that at the close of the debate Mr. Madison had reached a point where he contended that the subject of removing the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as he was then called, was one over which the Constitution had given the Executive entire control, and therefore that the clause introduced into the law was merely declaratory of what the Constitution was before. It is right also to say in this connection that Mr. Madison in the closet, Mr. Madison the philosopher and the student and the statesman, out of debate, seems by his writings contemporaneous with the formation of the Constitution, and in view of its adoption, to have considered the opposite to be the correct construction of the Constitution.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont is entirely correct in what he has said of the attitude of Mr. Madison in the course of that debate and the course of Mr. Madison in his correspondence. I said nothing to the contrary. I simply said that this question came under discussion upon the propriety of putting that authority by statute in the hands of the President, and that Mr. Madison advocated it, and I thought was animated by the confidence that he had in General Washington. I know that in the course of that debate he did declare that he believed such was the intention of the Constitution; but he did also declare in the course of that debate what I have already said, that the President who should exert this power for the purpose of proscribing political enemies or proscribing political opinions would be liable to impeachment.

The Senator from Maine repeats what the Senator from Vermont has urged, that these ministers are the confidential advisers of the President. That in practice they may not be so, of course I cannot say, for I have never been a President or a Cabinet officer; but that the Constitution ever intended they should be his confidential advisers I am prepared to deny. I think the whole practice of the President's consulting his ministers has grown out of this clause in the Constitution. Referring to the President, it says:

"He may require the opinion in writing of the principal officers in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices."

From which I understand, not that the President may convene all his Cabinet officers in secret conclave and hold a whispered consultation upon any measure of the Administration or of the Government, from which the world is excluded; but that on any measure touching the financial interests of the country he may ask, not the private, but the written opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury; and on any measure touching the military administration of the country he may require the written opinion of the Secretary of War, and so of the head of each of the other Departments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator if that clause of the Constitution does not assume that the President is responsible for the act; but he may ask the written advice of these heads of Departments as to how he shall perform the act; so that the Constitution does make the heads of these Departments his constitutional advisers, and contemplates that he shall be responsible for the act.

Mr. HOWE. Undoubtedly those who framed that clause expected the President to ask advice in reference to what he was to do or was not to do, and undoubtedly in reference to those acts he is responsible and must be, let any Secretary advise as he may. It does not follow that because he asks the opinion of the Secretary he is bound to follow it. If his Secretary is unfriendly to him, there is no reason in the world why he cannot criticise the advice the Secretary gives. He naturally would criticise it all the more for the fact that the Secretary was personally unfriendly; but it does not follow because the Secretary is personally unfriendly that he will advise in reference to a public measure dishonestly, for then he damns himself just as surely as he prejudices the President. It is to be remembered—and it is that which I want the Senate to remember—that each one of these officers is acting in reference to matters about which the law is explicit; they are discharging duties; and the question is what is or is not a duty. Not one of them, not all of them together, can legislate at all. The law imposes certain duties upon them and the question is what is the specific duty: and the President asks the opinion of a Cabinet officer just as my friend's clients take his opinion. "What are my interests?" or "what are my duties?" or "what are my responsibilities?" I take it they are governed by their estimate of his ability, not at all by the question whether they agree with him in political opinion, in determining whether they shall go to him or to some other attorney for advice.

It is said that it is essential that there should be harmony, not merely between the President and his ministers, but between the different ministers. Essential to whom? Doubtless essential to the President that he should have the personal support of all his ministers; but is it more essential to the nation, I ask you, that there should be harmony between the ministers and the President than that there should be harmony between the ministers and the people? The Constitution did not provide any such thing. If it had attempted any such thing, if it had wished any such thing, it would have said the President may select for his confidential advisers such men as he pleases. The Senate has no business to have any voice in the confirmation of Cabinet officers if it is the purpose of the law to make them the echo of the President.

But if the view of the Senator from Maine is correct, it is not only fatal to my amendment, but it is fatal to the whole bill; it is fatal to the bill as originally introduced, and it is fatal to the whole amendment reported by the committee; for he insists not merely upon the right of the President to remove a Cabinet minister who is obnoxious to him, but insists upon the right of a Cabinet officer to remove every one of his subordinates for the same reason. It happens, Mr. President, that you have no officer in the public employment who is not either directly the subordinate of the President or directly the subordinate of one or the other of his ministers; and if the Senator from Maine is correct in his theory, you ought to abandon this bill altogether and say, as the practice is, but as the law never was and never ought to be, that the President may remove his Cabinet ministers for such reason as is satisfactory to him, and that they may remove in turn every one of their subordinates; for this is a bill, not as the Senator from Maine seems to suppose, to vindicate the right of the Senate to confirm the nominations—the main purpose of this bill is to regulate the tenure and to restrict the right of the President to remove from office men who have been confirmed.

It was said by the Senator from Oregon, it was repeated by the Senator from Maine, that in practice this will have very little effect, because in practice it is said if a Cabinet minister comes to know that he is distasteful to the President he will not wait for an act of removal, but will retire voluntarily. That such cases have happened in the history of the country I suppose is true; but I suppose it is true because you have abandoned the protection of these offices and the protection of these officers, because you have surrendered to the President of the United States this control over them. I hold, on the contrary, that the Secretary who leaves an office created by law for the public good, not for the President's good, to which he has been appointed by the President and the Senate, and leaves that post of duty merely because the President, one individual of the great number that have to combine in making the appointment, intimates a wish that he should leave, is derelict to his duty and cannot be commended as a faithful public servant. He has no more right to do it because the President may intimate such a wish than he has to do it because any one Senator who voted upon his confirmation asks him to do it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, my friend from Maine referred to an opinion which I expressed at the last session, and which I repeat now, that the practice, if any President should pursue it, of reappointing to office during a recess a person who has been antecedently nominated and rejected by the Senate, is in conflict with the spirit of the Constitution. I have had occasion to say that to the present Attorney General and to the former Attorney General. The provisions of the Constitution, the Senate will remember, give to the President the authority to appoint certain officers by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and it is provided that other officers may be appointed in such mode as Congress may provide. In order to guard against the contingency of a vacancy in any of the offices, and as necessary to carry on the public business of the country, the President is vested with the power to appoint to office during the recess of the Senate; and by the very terms of the Constitution, the commission which he is to issue in cases of that description continues until the last day of the succeeding session of the Senate. As I have said to the officer to whom I refer, and as I say now to the Senate, what I think they will concur with me in believing to be very evident, the President, under the authority which he certainly has of appointing during the recess, may dispense with the action of the Senate altogether; for if the commission which he gives to the officer he so appoints continues until the termination of the next session, the last day of the session, there is then when Congress adjourns of course a vacancy in that office happening in the recess which he is to fill; and he may go on from time to time appointing during a recess so as to avoid entirely the authority and the controlling authority which the Constitution intended to give to the Senate of the United States over such appointments as the President is directed to send in to the Senate for confirmation.

But it is only for the President to say—perhaps all the Senate are not aware of it—that, in what he has done in cases of this description he has but followed the example of his predecessors; and that example was in its origin supported, and in the cases where it has been followed since, it has been supported, by the opinions of the several Attorneys General who happened to be in office at the time the instances occurred. Those Attorneys General were, I think—at least I only recollect those—Mr. Wirt, Mr. Taney, Mr. Cushing, Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Mason, and I believe three or four others. The question was not submitted to me when I was an incumbent of that office; but I had occasion to say to the President, whose officer I was at that time, that I certainly should not give that opinion, except upon the authority of the precedent, and if I yielded to that authority I should say that as an original question the law was really different.

The President has in some cases, I know—there are several nominations here that fall within that class—appointed during the recess persons whom he had before appointed during an antecedent recess, and who upon being nominated to the Senate at the last session were rejected. There may be cases in which the President would be justified in doing that, because of the particular circumstances of the case. He may be satisfied that the propriety of confirming the nomination was not brought entirely before the Senate, because all the facts which might exist in relation to the appointee were not before them. What I mean to say is, that in my judgment (and it is not a judgment recently formed, and it is one having no reference to the conduct of the present President for the time being, but it is an opinion long since formed) that a practice of that kind is altogether at war with the spirit of the Constitution, because it enables a President to avoid entirely the authority which the Constitution intended to give the Senate of the United States over such appointments as are to be made only by their consent.

But upon the question of the power of removing officers different considerations govern me. I believe it was at the first session of the First Congress—certainly at the time when the Treasury Department and the State Department were organized—that it became a subject of controversy in both branches of Congress whether the President had a right to remove without first consulting the Senate. A great many of the best men of that day thought that he had not; a great many of the lights that have adorned this Chamber since then thought that he had not the power; but from the time it was settled by a majority of one, I believe, that majority being the casting vote of the Vice President, up to the present time, it has not been seriously questioned that the President has the right to remove under the Constitution. Mr. Webster discussed the question during the presidency of General Jackson with the ability which marked all his efforts on this floor or anywhere else; but he offered no remedy; and every President from the time of General Washington up to the present time has exercised the power as one in his judgment clearly vested in him. I think he has the power.

But Mr. Madison, in the debate when the question was originally settled to which I have referred, stated, and I think stated very properly, that that power to remove, which he held to be a clear power, might be so abused as to furnish a just cause for impeaching the President; but in after times a removal for such a purpose as Mr. Madison intimated would be a just ground for an impeachment was held to be no ground for impeachment at all, or not ground of censure. The most striking cases that have occurred during our existence as a nation were those that occurred, or one particularly which occurred during the presidency of General Jackson. The Senator will remember that under the charter of the Bank of the United States the public moneys of the United States were to remain on deposit with that institution unless they were removed by the Secretary of the Treasury. I thought then, and think now, that it was the purpose of Congress in passing that charter to take from the President the power in that case to interfere with the duty which the section imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury; but the President decided otherwise, and he actually removed the incumbent. The Senate will see that that case presented the strongest one that can be imagined upon which to bring before Congress and bring before the courts of the country the question of the President's power to remove. The bank had an interest so deep that her safety depended upon the reversal of that authority. The public moneys being withdrawn from her vaults, the credit of the institution almost at once fell, or everybody saw that it must fall in a very short time, as in the end it did.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will allow me to ask for information. Did not the Senate concur in that change?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir; or rather concurred in the way I am about to state. The bank therefore had a remedy, a clear remedy, provided she had a case, and she had a clear case, if the President had no authority to force a removal of the deposits by the Secretary. She might have refused to pay over the deposits, and that would have brought the question immediately before the tribunals. There was no military law in force then, and the only way in which the moneys could have been recovered from the bank by the Government would have been by a suit, and if there was under the charter a contract between the bank and the Government which entitled the bank to hold on to the deposits until they were removed under the authority conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury, it would have been a complete defense to the removal which was actually ordered, provided it was true, and had been so adjudged, that the President had no control over the deposits; but the bank acquiesced, and I have every reason to believe that they took counsel of the ablest lawyers in the country.

The President removed the Secretary of the Treasury during the recess, and he appointed his then Attorney General. It is due to the memory of that officer, who afterward became, as we know, the Chief Justice of the United States, to say—and what I am about to state I state from personal knowledge—that he agreed to accept the appointment of Secretary of the Treasury upon General Jackson's appeal, founded upon the fact, which must have had very persuasive, and had not only persuasive but controlling operation upon the mind of the then Attorney General, that in ordering the deposits to be removed the President had the advice of the Attorney General as to the question of power, and having acted under the opinion of his law officer, and having some difficulty in finding any successor to Mr. Duane upon whom he could rely to accomplish the object that he had so much at heart—the removal of the deposits and the death of the bank, which he anticipated correctly would be the result of that removal—he appealed to the Attorney General to take the situation, and he took it and ordered the removal of the deposits. He was nominated to the Senate and rejected; and if I had been in the Senate I should have voted to reject him, not upon the ground of any incapacity of that gentleman to fill the office, but upon the ground that, according to the opinion I held at that time and still hold, the President of the United States was guilty in that instance of a usurpation, of a violation of what I believed to be a contract between the Government and the bank in ordering himself his Secretary of the Treasury to remove the deposits, and having removed him because he failed to comply with the order, appointing any one to carry that out, or to act upon his own opinion of the propriety of that removal.

It is due also to the Secretary to say—I mean him who became the successor of Mr. Duane—that he was satisfied at the time that the deposits in the Bank of the United States were in great danger. Whether he was right in that apprehension or not it is immaterial to inquire. Apparently, ostensibly what occurred afterward would show that he was right, because the bank became hopelessly insolvent. Whether she would have been insolvent and the deposits have been in any danger or have been lost if they had not been removed, is a question about which there may be difference of opinion.

But notwithstanding that very strong case, and I cannot imagine a stronger one, every Senator who spoke upon the nominations of the successor of Mr. Duane did not place the rejection of that successor upon the ground that Duane was still the Secretary of the Treasury; they all conceded that he was out; they acted in rejecting Mr. Taney upon the ground that in their opinion it was exceedingly improper in him to take the place for the purpose of carrying out what they believed to be the improper action of the President.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator indulge me in another inquiry? I ask if the statute creating the office of Secretary of the Treasury does not make the term dependent upon the pleasure of the President.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is so; but if my friend will turn to the debates—I have not seen them recently, but I am sure I recollect the substance of them—he will find that it was said in a report made by Mr. McDuffie in the other House, and I think in a speech made by Mr. Adams, and in several of the speeches made upon the floor of the Senate upon the question, that, notwithstanding that the charter of the bank constituted the Secretary of the Treasury the agent of Congress, and took him therefore out of the removing power of the President, that Congress had the authority to place the public funds wherever they thought proper, and in the exercise of that admitted power they had placed the funds in the hands of the Bank of the United States, and had, with a view to secure themselves against loss, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury as their officer, not the officer of the President, if he should discover at any time that there was any danger of the Government losing the deposits to remove them. The ground assumed by the President and admitted by the bank, as is evinced by their not contesting it, is the one stated by my friend from Maine, that the President's duty by the very words of the Constitution is to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and as the charter was a law and that law made it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to take the money from the Bank of the United States when it was in danger, if the President thought it was in danger, if he thought the public interest might suffer, then under the President's power to have the laws executed it was his duty to direct the Secretary to remove them, and the Secretary failing to do so, to remove him; and he pursued that course.

I think, as I have more than once said, I thought then that the President had no authority whatever over the subject, and that the ground assumed by McDuffie and others, and particularly in the debate in the Senate, was the sound one, that the Secretary of the Treasury was selected merely by virtue of his office as the most convenient and reliable person that Congress could select to watch over the funds of the Government, so as to see that at no time they should be endangered by the misconduct of the bank. Mr. Taney was rejected by the Senate, and somebody else, I forget who, appointed.

From that time until the last session the authority of the President to remove has never been questioned. The abuse of that authority is an entirely distinct question. The President is not above Congress or above the people during his continuance in office. He is as liable to impeachment as any other officer. The only limitation upon the power of impeachment is, that he shall be impeached only for high crimes and misdemeanors. If he commits a high crime or a misdemeanor in the sense in which those terms are used in the Constitution, the other branch of Congress may bring his case before the Senate in form of an impeachment, and this body has to act upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is not "misdemeanor" qualified by the word "high"?

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course, high crimes and high misdemeanors. I do not speak, I certainly have no desire to speak, of what we understand has in part commenced, because a contingency may happen when we are all to stand in the relation to this subject in the attitude of judges. I have no opinion, therefore, to express in advance. It would, in my judgment, be improper, as we are now situated in relation to the President, to express any opinion in advance. But that he is liable to control, under the authority conferred upon Congress to impeach, there can be no doubt. The question whether he has the power which he exercises in relation to removals from office, or the power which he exercises in relation to the reappointment of officers who have been rejected by the Senate, is one question. Whether he abuses either power is quite another question. And the question whether that abuse, if it be an abuse, is a high crime or a high misdemeanor, is another question also, upon which sooner or later perhaps, if we are to be visited by such an affliction, the Senate may have to pass.

What I said to my friend from Maine at the former session and what I admitted to-day is that in my judgment the President does go beyond the power conferred upon him when he reappoints a party whose nomination has been presented to the Senate and rejected, provided the case stands there and stands there alone. If he thinks proper to reappoint such a person, I think it is his duty to inform the Senate, when he sends that nominee in a second time for approval, what were the peculiar circumstances which caused him to disregard the opinion of the Senate. Any newly-discovered facts, any evidence which he supposes would operate upon the judgment of the Senate not in their possession at the time they voted upon the nomination in the first instance, he may produce; but to disregard the opinion of the Senate upon the exact case, on which the Senate acted, in my judgment is a clear abuse, which must be remedied in some way or other, and the only way to remedy it is to reject those who may be nominated again.

Mr. HENDERSON and Mr. SHERMAN. And he may reappoint again.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, my friends behind me say he may reappoint again. I know it, and it is for that reason that I said to him and said to his Attorney General at the last session that cannot be justified by me or by the Senate, and certainly will not be by me, because that would be to avoid altogether the authority of the Senate; and if he in the case supposed persevered in nominating and appointing again after one or more rejections, it would be in my judgment a very serious question whether that of itself would not constitute a ground for impeachment. If Mr. Madison was right in saying, as I stated to the Senate what was in their recollection before—I only mentioned it for the purpose of bringing it more freshly to their recollection—if Mr. Madison was right in saying that an abuse of the power of removal was a subject for an impeachment, a fortiori is the abuse of the power of appointment in a case in which, if it is submitted to, the whole authority of the Senate becomes a nullity and is set at defiance.

I have said so much upon that subject in justification of my own opinion. Now, a word upon the particular amendment offered by my friend from Wisconsin. I shall vote against the bill whether that amendment succeeds or not; but the effect of that amendment on the Government would be pretty much the same as the proposition which Mr. Calhoun more than once advocated, and the late Senator Hunter on this floor advocated, of a dual President. There were sectional dissensions sure to continue as long as the cause of those dissensions should exist, slavery. Now, as I trust, there is no cause for them except the temporary causes which have grown out of the late war. But they then existed and it was proposed to have two Presidents. It hardly received the support of any of the southern statesmen except the particular gentlemen who proposed it. It was said, and said with a force that must be obvious to us all, that the executive, to be at all competent to the duties of such an office, must be a unit. There can be no divided executive. The proposition fell. It hardly received a vote.

Now, what is to be the result of the amendment suggested by my friend from Wisconsin? The President—you cannot get clear of that obligation; you cannot take from him that duty, and he cannot absolve himself from that duty—is to see that the laws are faithfully executed. How is he to do it? He cannot do it alone. This is a great Government of ours. Its transactions are not the ordinary transactions of a common counting-house. They extend not only over all our limits, but they go beyond the limits. We have negotiations with the rest of the world and transactions with the rest of the world, and we are likely to be called into a conflict as we may discharge our duty properly or not toward the other nations of the world at any moment.

Suppose he has a Secretary of State whom he does not trust, either because of some suspicion of want of integrity or a belief that he is incompetent to the duties, or a belief founded upon good evidence that he is for pursuing a foreign policy that will entangle us with other nations, and perhaps involve us in war and affect our commercial marine; what is he to do with him? Leave him in, says the honorable member; suspend him. What then? What is to become of the negotiations in the mean time? What will foreign nations say? "We have been negotiating with the United States upon the assumption that they had a policy; we have acted in good faith; we can only know the President; we know that under the Constitution the Secretary of State is but his mouth-piece; we know, and we have been taught to believe, that it is in his power to shape the foreign relations of the country; and now, when his Secretary has been shaping them and he discovers that he is about by the shape which he has caused them to assume to involve us in trouble, he turns him out, and the whole negotiation is to begin again." And when he sends to the Senate his reasons for the suspension under this bill, as he will be obliged to do, and the Senate declares that they are unsatisfactory, this suspended officer becomes again the Secretary of State. What is the effect of that upon the President so far as the negotiation of which I have spoken is concerned? He ceases to have any control of it; he is a mere cypher; you might as well not have him. The organ, then, with foreign nations will be a Secretary of State of the Senate of the United States, and not the Secretary of State appointed to be an adviser of the President, and to carry out the policy which the President may think proper and may suppose should be adopted as between ourselves and foreign nations. So in relation to the fiscal concerns.

The observations which I have thus cursorily submitted to the Senate are equally applicable to either of the other Departments. Take the office of the Attorney General. The President finds he has made a mistake; he has appointed a man to that office who has proven his incompetency. I will assume a case as strong as that: he has not only not given evidence of competency, but he has demonstrated his incompetency by the opinions which from time to time he has given and by his efforts in the Supreme Court of the United States. The President sees that the laws, as far as they depend upon the law-officer of the Government, are not being executed; the district attorneys having no communication with the President except through the Attorney General, and the marshals acting now under the same authority, are doing what the law does not justify, suing where there is no cause for suit and not suing where suit should be instituted. What is he to do? Suspend the Attorney General? Who is he to get to take the place? I do not know, for I hope no such man is to be found. I do not believe any man could be found fit for the place who would take the office which he is to hold only during the suspension of the previous incumbent, which may be for but three or four weeks, for the miserable consideration of the proportion of the salary of the office that he would get during those few weeks. Then what will the President do? His duty is to get clear of an incompetent officer or one believed by him to be incompetent. He cannot get a competent officer under the provisions of this bill, if my friend's amendment prevails. Then the public suffers, suffers sadly. Everything is placed in confusion. Nobody knows officially what the rights of the United States are; nobody knows officially what are the interests of the United States, and how they are about being sacrificed. Nobody knows, and if anybody did know there would be no remedy for it, how entirely without faithful execution are the laws of the United States.

Then what becomes of the President? Why, in relation to that officer as well as in relation to the Secretary of State in the case supposed he is made a cipher.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As the Senate is now.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all wrong. I am not for making ciphers of any Department of the Government, and for the reasons which I stated just now, as far as concerns the reappointment of rejected officers, I am against it, because that is a practice which makes ciphers of us, and I am for claiming the whole of the power which the Constitution confers upon the Senate or upon the Congress of the United States. All that I mean to say, in conclusion, is that it is all-important that the Executive shall be a unit. If he fails to perform his duty criminally, the remedy is in our own hands.

If we unfortunately elect a man who is incompetent, not from willfulness, but from incapacity, the remedy which the Constitution confers is in the succeeding election, and in no other way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to prolong the debate upon this amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, but merely to state in reply to the observations of the Senator from Maryland, on the general question of the power of removal under the Constitution, that there are considerations which will be submitted to the Senate, when that question arises, which induce me to believe that it is just as necessary that the Senate should concur in removals from office, in order to have any voice in the appointment, as in the other case that he supposes; but as that question is not now pending, I rise merely to express the hope that Senators may, as far as they think it fit, refrain from going into that general question until we reach it, and that we may proceed to dispose of the amendment proposed by my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This bill comes from the joint committee of the two Houses upon retrenchment, of the Senate branch of which the Senator from Vermont is chairman. I desire in addition to what he has just said, the propriety of which will attract the attention of every Senator, to say that there are several subjects comprised in the bill, each of which is perfectly distinct; and what is to be done by the Senate in coming to a correct conclusion on this bill will be to keep the argument upon each point perfectly distinct and separate from the others.

The first section of the bill, and the matter contained in the second also, raises a very great question; and I hope that the members of the Senate will not commit their judgments upon it until it is distinctly and separately debated. It is new to us and it is hazardous, if not improper, that we should form hasty conclusions upon it.

Another and a distinct question is raised by the latter part of the second section, the conferring upon the President of the power of suspending from office without dismissing an officer. A provision of this kind in our legislation, if not altogether new, is new as a general provision, and it may likewise deserve separate consideration.

Finally, the third section is intended to meet a class of cases which has been spoken of in this debate: where the President fills a vacancy during a recess between the sessions of the Senate by issuing a commission which shall expire at the end of the next session by virtue of an express provision of the Constitution, then if during such next session that office shall not be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, it shall, after the adjournment of the Senate, remain vacant; the appointment shall remain in abeyance, to use the words employed in the section, and the duties of that office shall be discharged by some other officer who may be appointed or selected by law.

Now, sir, the first question, to wit, the power of the President to make removals from office, is one which was settled in the first session of the first Congress which met after the organization of our Government, and that decision, if not unchallenged, at least has not been reversed in the practice of this Government seventy-seven years; and when we come to reopen the debate upon it we must take care that we approach this great subject in the proper temper, in a spirit of impartiality, and without any disposition or proclivity of mind to be influenced by considerations other than those which pertain to the merits of the question itself. I intend at some point in the debate to be heard upon this one question involved in the bill; but for the present I join in the hope expressed by the chairman of the Senate branch of the committee on retrenchment that we shall not raise that general debate. It is not necessarily involved in the motion now pending before the Senate for the amendment of the first clause of the committee's substitute, to wit, the question whether the power of the President with regard to removals from office shall be curtailed so far as his own Cabinet ministers are concerned. That is a distinct and independent question, and I hope we shall determine it without extending ourselves, or permitting the debate to extend itself, into the whole field.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, striking out the words in the first section of the committee's amendment indicated by him.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are two amendments that I desire to offer to this bill; the first to correct what I think is an inadvertence: it is in the first section, line ten, after the word "office" to insert the words "during the term limited by law." I will read the section:

That every person (excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General and the Attorney General) holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided.

Take the case of a postmaster, where he is appointed by the law for four years, or for a fixed term. If it is the intention of the Senator, by the first section, to extend the duration of his term of office—

Mr. BUCKALEW. Read the fourth section.

Mr. SHERMAN. But still the first section expressly provides that he "shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed."

Mr. WILLIAMS. "Except as herein otherwise provided."

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps that fourth section might cover it, but I do not think so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend from Ohio will allow me, I will give him the explanation of that. I think it indispensable to the scheme on which the bill goes that that language should stand just as it does. It is intended to meet a case of this description: a good officer, a postmaster for instance, continues during the four years prescribed by law. A successor to him is nominated in due season by the President. It appears to us that the successor is a very improper person to fill the office. Now, the object of this provision is, that in cases of that description the old officer shall hold over beyond the duration of the four years until the President and the Senate shall be able to concur in selecting his successor; and that, with the provision of the fourth section, that the general duration of the office shall still be limited by law, I think puts it upon precisely the ground that it should be put upon, provided we are to pass the bill at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems then that I was correct in the construction which I gave to the two sections together: that it was intended by the first section to extend the duration of the term of office in case the President and the Senate should not agree upon the successors. I am not in favor of that—by general legislation extending the term of office. The term of a vast number of offices is fixed by law. I think when the office expires by limitation or by death, or by a removal made for good cause, there ought to be power in the President to fill the vacancy at once; that we ought not by legislation to continue the officer beyond the term for which he was appointed by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it be improper, as is supposed by my friend from Ohio, to allow an officer who has held an office for four years to continue to exercise the duties of the office after that term of four years until the President and the Senate shall be able to agree upon his successor, then it would be simply declaring either that the office must go vacant, or else that in the meantime the President may select some person without regard to our wishes, treating it as a vacancy lawfully happening and selecting his own appointee for a temporary commission, whose name he need never send to us at all to fill up the place. The consequence would then be that if we failed to concur in that, the party who held the office temporarily might continue, as has been said, during the long recess, and hold the office for a very considerable length of time. It appeared to the committee that if an officer, against whom no charge of impropriety had been made, who was fitly and honestly performing the duties of the office, should come to the expiration of the period limited by law, and the President and the Senate should fail to agree as to his successor, it would be best for the public service to allow that officer temporarily, until we should agree, to continue to exercise the duties rather than to have him go out, and the mere appointee of the President alone, without consulting us at all, put in his place. If the Senator from Ohio on reflection disagrees with me as to that, I shall very much regret it indeed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to press this matter. I simply desired to call attention to what several Senators supposed to be an inadvertence. But take the case of a bond. The term of office expires the four years expire; the bond is not obligatory after the expiration of the four years. The receipts and disbursements by an officer after the four years are not secured by his bond. Take the case of the expiration of the term of office. The Constitution provides how that vacancy shall be filled if it occurs. During the recess of the Senate the President fills it; and in case the vacancy occurs during the session of the Senate it is filled in the mode pointed out by the Constitution; so that there is practically no difficulty. The President will have at least until the close of the following session of Congress in which to fill the vacancy. In case it cannot then be filled on account of a disagreement between the Senate and the President, then the deputy or whoever is legally provided by law can fill the vacancy as the bill declares; so that it seems to be the effect of the first section to continue the duration of the tenure of office beyond the term fixed by law, and without the security of the bond in the case of a disbursing officer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to my friend that the bonds, as now prepared by the Treasury Department, are so drawn as to cover the time which may elapse after the expiration of the term of office and before the appointment of a successor. They cover all the time during which an officer continues to exercise the duties of the office.

Mr. SHERMAN. Having called the attention of the Senate to this subject, I have no objection to letting this amendment pass over until we can look into it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think this feature of the section will be found, on examination, to be a necessary element to reach the general scope that the idea of the bill was intended to provide for.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw the present amendment. I desire to offer another amendment as an additional section. It is the bill which I introduced at the beginning of the session and referred to the Judiciary Committee, and which has been fully considered. It is to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That no money shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States to any person who, having been nominated for any office and been rejected by the Senate, and subsequently appointed to that office by the President, for any salary, fees, perquisites, or expenses accruing after the close of the session of the Senate during which his nomination was rejected; and if any person shall appoint or sign or prepare such an appointment or commission, or if any person so rejected and reappointed shall hold or exercise the functions of the office for which he was rejected by the Senate, after the close of the session of the Senate at which he was rejected, or if any accounting or disbursing officer shall allow or pay to any person so rejected any salary, fees, perquisites, or expenses accruing for that office after the close of the session of the Senate at which he was rejected, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not exceeding $10,000, or at the discretion of the court shall be imprisoned not more than five years.

I will state that this section was drawn early in the session, printed, and referred to the Judiciary Committee, and the chairman of that committee stated to me it was not acted upon because of the pendency of this bill, the subject being before another committee, and upon the statement that it could then be offered when the bill came up. It is intended to provide for cases that have actually occurred, where the President has sent a nomination to the Senate which has been rejected, and yet in violation of the spirit of the Constitution, of the meaning of the Constitution, the President insists upon keeping that person in office, and again appoints him to office and sends his name again to the Senate. It is intended to meet the very case mentioned by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] the other day. I do not think there ought to be any real objection to it. I can scarcely conceive a case in which the President would be justified in entirely ignoring the opinion of the Senate on a matter in which it has equal constitutional power with himself.

This section is so drawn as not to prevent the President from sending the name of a rejected person again to the Senate, so as to enable them to reconsider the nomination. If a rejection has been made upon misadventure or false statements of fact, the President may again send that name to the Senate at a subsequent session; nothing in this amendment will prevent it; but in the mean time he would be bound to respect the judgment of the Senate so far as to appoint some one else to fill the office until the close of the following session. Then he may at the next session send in the name to the Senate and they may reconsider the nomination of the person formerly rejected; so that it does not operate as an exclusion from office, or a denial of the power to hold that particular office. It simply provides that the judgment of the Senate shall be so far respected that until the nomination is again submitted to the Senate and confirmed that person shall not hold that particular office. He may be appointed to some other.

There was one difficulty I had in framing this proposition, and about that I am not entirely satisfied, and that is as to the accountability of accounting officers in paying salaries to persons who have been rejected by the Senate. Perhaps they cannot always be formally or legally notified of the rejection. There may be a difficulty in that; but that was provided for by a bill which was pending at the time I drew this section, which required the rejections to be communicated to certain disbursing officers; and if this section should be adopted it will be necessary to have some such provision as was contained in the former bill at the time I drew this section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a good deal of merit in the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, and I do not know but that I should be willing to agree to the proposition entirely, considered by itself; but in many respects I think, from the study that I have given to the subject, it will fail to meet all the objects that he has in view. He has suggested one of the difficulties, and that is, in respect to the payment of money to the persons who shall be thus appointed, and possibly it may not be known to the Treasury how it is. That is the case, as I understand, as a matter of actual fact. They seem to have a system of regulations and procedure in the Treasury Department by which either it is everybody's business not to know whether any money is illegally paid out of the Treasury, or else it is nobody's business in particular to know. Each officer in the routine takes the particular paper that he has as prima facie evidence of the propriety of the person receiving the money who is named in it; and therefore on a recent inquiry addressed to myself, in connection with these very investigations, to the Treasury Department to know whether, since the 9th of February, 1863—I think that is the date at which time Congress passed a law forbidding such payments as these to persons thus appointed—any payments had been made from the Treasury to such persons, I have received a reply from the Secretary of the Treasury communicating the reports upon that subject of his auditors and comptrollers, each report upon the subject being taken by itself, stating that it is not that particular officer's business to know whether any such event has occurred or not, and therefore the Secretary concludes, taking the whole three reports together (I believe there are three) that so far as the knowledge of the Department goes no such event has occurred; while I venture to say, although I do not speak by authority or on my personal knowledge, as a matter of probability that a great many persons of that description have received money from the Treasury since the passage of the act of 1863, in violation of law.

Now all that must be provided for. All that was considered by the committee who reported this bill with the amendment. It appeared to them that, inasmuch as the subject of this bill was one which was working a great practical change in the administration of the Government, one the propriety of which would be greatly doubted by many men, one the constitutionality of which would be greatly contested by many persons in the country, it would be better on the whole to report the simple proposition first, determining whether Congress should take any action on the subject, and provide simply by this bill for regulating the tenure of these offices and the method of removal and the substitution of other persons to the administration of them; and if the Senate should think it fit to pass the bill and to provide for this general change in the administration of the Government, we would then prepare and report to the Senate immediately, and I promise the Senator that I will devote the skill I possess with his aid to such further legislation in the way of penalties and in the way of guarding the Treasury against any evasion as should be necessary, when we decide that we will enter upon what may be called an experiment. Therefore it is that I hope my friend from Ohio will for the present withdraw his amendment and let the sense of the Senate be taken upon the general question which is involved in the simple bill which we have submitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the object of the Senator will be accomplished by this bill. I will state to him beforehand that I have no doubt it will be treated just as our previous legislation on the subject has been treated. It has been utterly disregarded and its constitutionality denied. There were no terms in it to enforce its provisions. There is nothing in this bill that is not already enacted with regard to other matters. Take the case I will put: we passed a law declaring that no money should be taken from the Treasury of the United States to pay an officer who had been once rejected by the Senate. That is utterly disregarded to my personal knowledge.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there any such law? I am not aware of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. When was it passed?

Mr. SHERMAN. In 1863.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh yes; I remember it now.

Mr. SHERMAN. The attention of the executive officers was called to the law, and the President submitted it to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General has given his opinion—at least I have seen it in the newspapers, not formally, but I presume the statement is correct—that the law is unconstitutional, and that the President has the power.

Mr. JOHNSON. What Attorney General?

Mr. SHERMAN. The present Attorney General. I get this from newspaper statements, and they may do him injustice, but it is published in the newspapers as his opinion, and I think it is acted upon, that an appointment once rejected by the Senate may be renewed the very day after our rejection.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is not the point.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not the point here; but the opinion is, that consequently our attempt to prevent such a person being paid salary, &c., is unconstitutional and void; that the officer being legally appointed is entitled to the legal salary attached to the office; and therefore the provision which denies to accounting officers the authority to pay him is utterly disregarded. There is one case in the State of Ohio where an assessor was appointed by the President and rejected by the Senate after deliberation, and he was reappointed and is now holding the office. There is another case, I am informed, in the State of New York, where the same person is again sent to us.

Mr. HENDERSON. Sloanaker, in Philadelphia.

Mr. SHERMAN. And one case in Philadelphia, where the nomination was for a long time considered, and the action of the Senate was publicly known upon it, known to every one. Now, in regard to the knowledge, there is no doubt that the President knew of this rejection, because it is communicated to him. There is no doubt the Treasury Department know, because it is communicated to them. All these papers go through a regular routine. We all know they have at least intelligence of them. My amendment is so framed that if the President should make such an appointment, and authorize the payment of money under those circumstances, he would be guilty of a declared offense, a high crime and misdemeanor. If he should violate that law once or twice, the Senator from Maryland says that he would be willing to impeach him. I think it is important for us to declare this offense beforehand in a law fully considered, that we may punish him for its violation. It is perfectly idle for us to pass a bill which simply declares the law without having any penalty attached. I think, with due deference to my friend from Vermont who has examined this question, that he ought to attach to this bill—I am not wedded to my own particular form of words—some penal clause that will punish a violation of the law and will also punish the payment of money where it is already prohibited by law. But if he will take the subject in charge and make such a section, with the views we have in common, I am perfectly willing to withdraw my amendment. I do not wish to embarrass this bill at all, or delay it by discussing it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will mention to my friend that that is precisely what the whole joint committee on full consultation thought it desirable should be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. It ought to be done in this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is merely a question of convenience as to how we shall get at it. We desire to pass just such a law in substance as the Senator from Ohio desires, and we desire to have it so comprehensive and so specific that no man, even an Attorney General, can pretend to misunderstand its provisions or escape if he violates it. That is what we want. But, as I said before, inasmuch as the chief subject of this bill—that is, the fundamental idea of it—with respect to which all this machinery and all these penalties are to attach, if we pass it at all, was a new one which would undergo debate and dispute, and all that, we thought it more desirable, as a matter of expediency and convenience, to bring forward first the main measure as a separate proposition, and if the main measure should meet the approval of the Senate we would then immediately bring forward those additional measures which should completely protect it. That was our idea. We may be wrong about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to have it attached to this bill. If the Senator says he will take the subject under consideration before the bill passes from the Senate and attach a penal clause to what is declared to be the law, I have no objection to withdrawing my amendment; but I wish it attached to this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that meets the views of Senators preferably to that which the committee thought it was best to do, we shall acquiesce. It is a mere question of convenience.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it ought to be placed on this bill. I withdraw my amendment in order to allow the Senator to look over the subject.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the hour is getting late, with the assent of the Senate, I was about to move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let the Senator from Michigan offer his amendment so that we may know what it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. HOWARD. It is to come in after the word "Senate" on page 3, section two, line eleven. There does not appear to be any provision in the amendment which we are discussing requiring persons who are to receive the necessary appointments at the hands of the President on the suspension of an incumbent, to give bonds or any security for the performance of their duty. I think the Senator from Vermont, on looking at it, will see the necessity of it, and I propose after the word "Senate" to insert the following:

And shall require of such person bond with sufficient surety or sureties for the faithful discharge of his official duties under such temporary appointment, if such bond be required by law of the person suspended.

I think the Senator from Vermont will see no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That subject had not escaped the attention of the committee, but that also was one of the details of subsequent machinery in connection with many existing laws respecting the giving of bonds by all persons and respecting the penalties for the violation of the official duties for which the bonds are given in respect to which the law is exceedingly disjointed and loose, that we had intended to bring forward. I do not know that I have any objection, if the Senator desires to press it here, to the insertion of that amendment. I should like to hear it reported again, however.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will suggest to the Chair that there is a pending motion to amend already a different part of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio withdrew his amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But there is a pending amendment moved by the Senator from Wisconsin to strike out certain words. Now, the Senator from Michigan moves to insert different words in an entirely different place in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin has been disposed of and rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to look at the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, as I think its phraseology is not exactly what it ought to be. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. POLAND. Before the Senate adjourns I desire to give notice that on Monday morning next I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bankrupt bill.

The motion of Mr. EDMUNDS was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 10, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. PHILIP JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, appeared in his seat.

HARBOR OF ST. JOSEPH, MICHIGAN.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making appropriation to repair and complete the pier and improvements in the harbor of St. Joseph, on Lake Michigan, and report by bill or otherwise.

CANCELLATION OF REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill supplementary to an act relating to the cancellation of revenue stamps; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PAY OF DETACHED OFFICERS, ETC.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that commissioned officers and enlisted men who have served in the Army or Navy of the United States in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, who were separated from their commands, regiments, or companies, as prisoners of war, or in consequence of being placed on detached service by proper detail, or on special duty by their superior officers, or who were disabled by wounds or disease contracted while in the service and in the line of their duty, shall, on muster out and settlement of their accounts with the Government, be entitled to receive full pay and allowance up to the time they received notice of their muster out or discharge or to the time they were permitted to go to their homes to await their discharge; and that in such case they shall be entitled to the usual commutation for travel and rations when the same were not furnished; so that such officers and enlisted men shall be allowed full pay and allowance for the full time they were subject to the military authority of the United States, and were thereby prohibited from engaging in other occupations.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BOYER. I ask to be excused from further service upon the Committee on the Militia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] also asks leave to be excused from service on the same committee. If there is no objection the gentlemen will be excused.

No objection being made, both the gentlemen were excused from service.

REPRESENTATION FROM ALABAMA AND TEXAS.

Mr. COOPER presented the credentials of Hon. Thomas J. Foster, claiming to be a Representative-elect to Congress from the sixth congressional district of the State of Alabama; which were referred to the committee on reconstruction.

Also, the credentials of Hon. A. M. Branch, claiming to be a Representative-elect to Congress from the third congressional district of Texas.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order, the question pending at the adjournment last evening.

Mr. BLAINE. I would request that the gentleman make the motion he did yesterday and let the morning hour go on.

Mr. GARFIELD. Can I do that?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then for the sake of allowing the morning hour to go on I move to postpone the regular order until the expiration of the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF POST ROUTE AGENTS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and the first business in order is the call of the committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which is entitled to another morning hour.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill in regard to the compensation of route agents of the Post Office Department; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read in full, authorizes the Postmaster General to pay route agents in the service of the Post Office Department any sum not less than $900 nor more than $1,200 per annum.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I would like to have the bill explained.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will my colleague on the committee yield and allow me to offer an amendment in relation to the pay of postal railway clerks, to allow them twenty per cent. increased compensation?

Mr. ALLEY. I think the gentleman had better not press that amendment. I am informed by the gentleman from Iowa that there is no necessity for it—that the Department has the power already to pay such sum as they deem expedient.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I differ with the gentleman.

Mr. ALLEY. I think it had better come in as a separate bill. I think on the whole I must object to allowing the amendment of my colleague upon the committee to be offered, inasmuch as gentlemen all around me who are interested feel that it would embarrass the bill. I think to this bill there cannot be the slightest objection, and there might be to the other proposition.

I supposed that no explanation would be required on this subject. I supposed that every gentleman in the House understood the nature and character of this service of route agents. I presume nearly all the route agents are appointed upon the recommendation of members, and they are therefore certainly conversant with the duties of this service. I think all will agree in the statement I shall make, that this service is the most poorly paid of any that is rendered to the Government. The present route agents get only $800 a year as a general rule. Some of them, I believe, are paid $900, but in no instance does their pay exceed $1,000, and the Postmaster General is not authorized to pay any larger sum than $1,000; and I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I can hardly reconcile it to my sense of justice for the Government to refuse to pay any of these men over $1,000, many of whom, as we all know, are persons of the greatest efficiency, energy, and capacity.

The circumstances of the service of these route agents are these: they are obliged, as all members of the House I suppose are aware, to leave their homes a great part of the time, to be away from their families, and be subject to extra expense. Now, they must necessarily be very competent and intelligent men. The service which they are required to perform is in its nature somewhat hard, and having to perform such service requiring so much ability for such a small compensation, and being obliged to incur extra expenses, the committee were unanimously of the opinion that their pay should be raised to a sum not exceeding $1,200 per annum. I think it should be even larger than that, but the committee agreed upon this sum as the maximum and $900 as the minimum; and as the members of the House are all so well acquainted with the nature of the service, and as it is of such a character that I think no reasonable opposition can be made to the bill, I therefore, if no further explanation is required, will call the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not had an opportunity of meeting the Post Office Committee this session, and I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee why the Postmaster General should not be permitted to employ persons for less than $900 a year.

Mr. ALLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who was not present in the committee when this matter was discussed, that it was fully considered in the committee, and they were unanimously of the opinion that the amount of compensation had better be limited to $900 on the one side, and extended to at least $1,200 on the other, as the nature of the service is of such a character that no portion of it should be required for a less sum than $900 a year; and it was thought that it was sufficient to leave a discretionary power to this extent in the hands of the Postmaster General, and to confine it there.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman will allow me to say that in the neighborhood of cities we sometimes get an extra mail by getting a carrier to carry the mail, whose compensation is much less than $900 a year. He is employed, perhaps, for two hours a day, and if the Government is required to pay these men at least $900 a year we shall have to dispense with some of these extra mails within a short distance from cities.

Mr. ALLEY. I will say to the gentleman that such an agent of the Post Office Department as that indicated, performing such service, would not be under the law properly a route agent, and is not so considered by the Department. There is, therefore, no force in that objection, and I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. [Cries of "No, no."] I think, as we are doing nothing but hardening the Treasury and increasing salaries, that the country should know who does it. I insist on the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 462) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

BRIDGE OVER THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. ALLEY also, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill declaring the Clinton bridge across the Mississippi river at Clinton, in the State of Iowa, a post route; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read through.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I submit that this is the same proposition that was voted down by this House at the last session.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman state that it is identically the same proposition?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is substantially the same proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. It is a very different proposition.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is very nearly the same proposition that was introduced last session by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] and reported in another bill by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY.]

Mr. DAVIS. It is entirely different.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Has not a committee a right to report a bill that has once been defeated?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that at another session of Congress they could certainly report a bill of the same character, but this is not the same bill as was reported last session, as the Chair understands.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is substantially the same proposition to dam up the Mississippi river.

The SPEAKER. The Digest states that at the same session, on the same day even, a bill not differing in substance, though differing in terms somewhat from one already rejected, may be reported from a committee. Certainly the same thing could be done at another session. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I oppose, Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to another point of order?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; I rise to take the floor in opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY,] as the chairman of the committee reporting the bill, is first entitled to the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at this time to say much in reference to this bill. I will merely explain that this bill, substantially in many respects, was presented for consideration at the last session in the form of an amendment to a bill which was passed authorizing the erection of several bridges across the Mississippi river. But the bill now reported is somewhat different from that amendment; it has more guards and restrictions than that had; and therefore the committee thought it could be properly reported at this time to the House.

I do not propose to say anything on the merits of the bill at this time, but to give way in a few moments to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to make such remarks as he chooses in opposition to it. Preliminary to that I will merely say that that gentleman yesterday charged me with having attempted to get that bill through at the last session under the gag of the previous question, and only yielded to allow its discussion for a short time. In reference to that, I will only say that I voluntarily gave the gentleman more time a great deal than I occupied myself, as chairman of the committee, in the discussion of that bill, and I believe that other gentlemen who opposed the bill occupied more time than its friends. Now, I submit whether under these circumstances the gentleman was justified in saying that the committee attempted to gag this thing through the House.

Further, I will say, with regard to the argument of the gentleman to-day, I suppose his argument at this time will be about the same that he made before. He then had a great deal to say about the Rock Island bridge; very little about this bridge, for the reason that he could not say anything against this structure, at least, as I believe, rightfully and properly. As to the Rock Island bridge I concede to him, and so do all of the committee, and so do I believe the majority of the House, that that structure is not at all what it should be. But whatever the opposition to that structure may be, it has no bearing whatever upon this one, and I will say to the gentleman that, for argument's sake, I will agree in advance to all he may say about the Rock Island bridge, and I beg of him to confine himself in his remarks to this bridge, to its character, and to its merits. If he will do that, I can assure him that he can have all the time he desires to discuss it to his heart's content.

Now, allow me to say one word further before I yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] This last autumn several members of Congress passed over that bridge, myself among them. Their attention was called to it and they examined it thoroughly, and I think they will all concur with me when I say that we were greatly surprised when we saw such a bridge, the best structure I think that we ever saw of the kind; scarcely any obstruction in the slightest degree to the navigation of the river. I think we were all very much surprised, in view of the actual facts, at the statements made upon this floor by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] at the last session. I now yield the floor for thirty minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] proposes to impose the gag rule here to-day. He does not propose to yield the floor entirely, so that this question can be fairly discussed, but he proposes to hold the previous question to close the discussion whenever he pleases.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I have never been more surprised in my life than I was yesterday morning when I was notified that this proposition, which was considered by the House at the last session and indignantly rejected, was to be again sprung upon us yesterday morning. Other matters intervened, and it has come over to us this morning.

I am surprised, sir, that the gentleman from Massachusetts and the Post Office Committee should, after a measure has been fully considered and discussed and rejected by this House, undertake to spring substantially the same measure upon the House without having given the people who are interested any notice of what they were doing or any hearing before the committee. Sir, they suppressed all information of what was going on in relation to this bill, and the first notice I had of it was yesterday morning, when the committee were called on to report, and I was advised that they intended to report this bill. Sir, it would seem to the uninitiated that there was something extraordinary in this matter. Great questions of public interest—great questions in which the people are interested—are regarded as of subordinate importance. When there arises a measure by which corporations or a few individuals only are to be benefited the people go to the wall; they are allowed no hearing.

Gentlemen may recollect something of the discussion which took place in reference to this bridge at the last session. Here was a bridge which I know, and which every pilot and steamboat man upon the Mississippi river knows, to be a material obstruction to navigation. This fact has been sworn to by fifty witnesses, whose testimony was before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. But there is a great mammoth consolidated corporation, the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company, which is getting into its clutches all the railroads of the Northwest. This mammoth corporation, in conjunction with other roads, and in conjunction with the Albany Bridge Company, has built across the Mississippi river a bridge which is an obstruction to navigation. At the last session, Congress with the concurrence of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY,] considering this whole question of bridges, deeming it absolutely necessary that there should be bridges over the Mississippi river, provided by law how those bridges should be built. We provided a certain breadth of span, and made other provisions which would render it certain that those bridges would not be material obstructions. But, sir, this Clinton bridge, built by these corporations, obstructs the navigation of the Mississippi river, and does not conform in any respect to the requirements to which other bridges are made to conform. The gentleman from Massachusetts now has, I must say, the audacity to come in here and ask this Congress to relieve this stupendous and remorseless monopoly from the expense of making this bridge conform to the requirements which apply to the other bridges on the Mississippi river. I ask gentlemen here whether they are prepared to do this act of injustice. What reason is there that this bridge, owned by these corporations, should be taken out of the general rule prescribed for every other bridge?

But the gentleman from Massachusetts has "traveled" somewhat. Probably he went out with other members of Congress on a junketing expedition, and went over this bridge. The railroad officers, with their magnificent car, filled with wines and turkeys and other good provisions, took some of our members of Congress, including, I presume, our distinguished friend from Massachusetts, and showed them this bridge. With not a steamboat within sight, with no means of practical observation, they said, "Do you suppose this bridge is an obstruction to the navigation?" "Oh, no; not at all. We do not see why a steamboat cannot go through. We do not see why the rafts and barges which the hardy lumbermen from Minnesota and Wisconsin float down the river—those barges which bring down grain, a part of which goes to Massachusetts to feed the shoemakers of Lynn—we do not see why these rafts and barges cannot go through." Oh, no, they could not see. I will not say that after dining they were not in a condition to see. [Laughter.] At any rate the gentleman says they did not see. Well, sir, here, in a document which I hold in my hand, is what some men have seen, men who have navigated that river to my knowledge for fifteen or twenty years. What do they say in regard to this matter of obstruction? These are not honorable members of Congress. Oh, no; they are nothing but plain pilots and steamboat captains and engineers. They are not supposed to know much, I suppose; and they have in this House, I presume, "no rights which white men are bound to respect." What do they say?

"The undersigned, pilots, captains, and experts in the navigation of the Upper Mississippi river, and owners of boats engaged in the navigation of the Upper Mississippi river, being duly sworn, state on oath—"

This is a statement under oath. The member from Massachusetts, I believe, was not under oath when he made his statement, although his word is just as good as his oath anywhere. These men certify under oath—

"that they believe the bridge across the Mississippi river at Clinton, Iowa—"

This is the bridge in question—

"as at present constructed is a very material obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river; that they each and all have had experience in the navigation through the draw of said bridge, and speak from actual experience and knowledge; that the same causes great risk to life and property in passing through the same, and causes great delay and loss to owners by detention on account of wind or darkness at times, when but for the bridge that portion of the river could be run with perfect ease and safety."

"That the said bridge is located where there is a curve in the river, and the piers are set down at an angle of from ten to fifteen degrees to the current, causing great difficulty in the approach to the draw, and danger of collision."

"That the draw is only one hundred and twenty feet in width, and the difficulty is greatly increased when boats have barges in tow."

I ask my friend from Massachusetts what he provided at the last session of Congress as the width of the draw of every other bridge? One hundred and sixty feet, making a difference of forty feet in favor of this bridge of these monopolists. It was provided that every other bridge should have a certain span, but that this shall be legal with only twenty feet.

I ask, in all candor and earnestness, what is the reason for that difference? Is it because you do not want to tax these combined railroads a few thousand dollars to make their bridge to conform to others? Is that what you are legislating for? If so, I do not think you will have many friends along the line of these roads, which are charging so enormously for fare and the transportation of freight that they have become utterly odious and accursed of our people.

It says that this draw is only one hundred and twenty feet, and that the difficulty is greatly increased when boats have barges in tow. Let me tell gentlemen here in regard to these barges in tow. It is undoubtedly going to be the means of transportation upon the Mississippi river, some boats having fifteen or twenty barges in tow, after we get the impediments to navigation removed, from the falls of St. Anthony to New Orleans, before breaking bulk. In that view the matter becomes of vast importance. Why, sir, the damage of one single fleet of barges at this bridge, as you propose to legalize it, by the danger of shifting and other delays, would amount to three or five hundred dollars. This the people of the Northwest, the people of Massachusetts, and the people everywhere, will have to pay in the increased cost by the added cost of transportation. That is what it means when these railroads come here and ask us to legislate in their favor.

Here is another statement, that the average width of a large boat, including guards, has nearly sixty feet, and the additional width of two barges would be about fifty feet more, so that only ten feet on each side is allowed. That is when they have only two barges, one on each side, but where they have a fleet of barges of fifteen or twenty, five or six abreast, where are they?

They say that where there is a current this margin is entirely too small for safe navigation even in calm weather, and when there is any wind, or it is dark, the danger is greatly enhanced.

This sworn statement is signed by twenty men, captains, pilots, and engineers.

I do not wish to argue this question at length. It was argued as far as the gentleman would permit at the last session of Congress, and when we voted on it it was rejected. I thought it was dead. I did not think we would hear of such an impudent proposition again. If the gentleman had advised me of what he intended I would have brought other testimony. I would have brought instructions from the Legislature. I would make the voice of the people heard here if the voice of the people could penetrate these walls in regard to these questions. But they laid low, they kept dark, they met and agreed upon this bill and sprung it upon the House, and demand we should pass it under the previous question.

One word more. The gentleman says I did him injustice when I said he undertook to gag the bill through. Gentlemen will recollect how it was. He did not propose to give me more time than from three to ten minutes, and I would not accept it; I would not take that time in a matter involving millions of loss to the country. The gentleman carried the previous question by three votes.

Then I demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, and believing he could not carry it the gentleman under the force of circumstances yielded me thirty minutes. If that is not as near a gag as you can come, I do not know it. And now, instead of having this matter fairly discussed, he withdraws the demand for the previous question, holds the floor, and allows me but thirty minutes. It is more than I wanted, however, for I think even in so short a time as I have taken I have explained the matter satisfactorily to the House. At any rate I will reserve the balance of my time to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like to ask my colleague how long this bridge has been in existence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. A part of this bridge is in my congressional district. I am presumed to know something about that section, for I have lived there twenty-five years. It has been there five or six years, and it has been a constant source of annoyance and complaint all the time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Has my colleague got any authentic case that he can present to the House of detention, delay, or injury to the navigation of the Mississippi? Has any steamer been proved, by any document here, to have been detained or injured?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Yes, sir; testimony was presented to the committee, if I am not mistaken, showing in one case damage to the amount of $4,000.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to reply to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ALLEY. I will.

Mr. DAVIS. This bridge was constructed, the gentleman from Massachusetts states, in 1864, and was open to navigation in March, 1865; and yet the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] says that for the last six years this bridge has been a source of constant complaint and great damage to the navigation on the Mississippi river. Now, sir, when I say that not one single suit has been brought against that company for any damage to any vessel or craft, when I say that no claim has ever been made against the company for damage, and when I say—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman say there is not a case now pending in the United States court in Iowa for damage?

Mr. DAVIS. Not one. The attorney of the company swore before the committee that no suit had been commenced, except one by way of indictment against the company, in regard to which they asked the protection of Congress. That is all I have to say now; hereafter I may have occasion to speak further on the subject.

Mr. ALLEY. I will yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to say a very few words in reply to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN;] not in reply to his denunciation of railroad corporations; he may pitch into them as much as he pleases for all me; not in reply to his allusions to the industry and economy of pains-taking New England, his native country; they always take care of themselves—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They propose to take care of us. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. Not in reply to his passion on the subject of gag; he can always protect himself in that line as well as any gentleman on this floor. But, sir, I see beyond the Mississippi a vast stretch of country out of which we are from time to time adding to the sisterhood of western States. There are I believe four of these organized now, and yesterday bills were passed in the Senate admitting two more. We are donating lands for the purpose of building railroads to grasp the commerce of these new States and bring their products into the markets of the East. We have just learned that three hundred and five miles of the Union Pacific railroad are completed. It is being rapidly pushed on, and very soon will be out of sight in the deep shadows of the setting sun. We want to connect with the commerce of the States, and if every time we propose to bridge the Mississippi we are to be told that that commerce does not rightfully belong to the East, that it must pass through the Mississippi river, and that you must not dam up that stream, it would have been a great deal better for the country if God had never given us the Mississippi. We must connect with this commerce, and it is impossible to do it without in some slight degree obstructing navigation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I agree with a great deal that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said; but tell me why we should make a discrimination in favor of this bridge and make the draw forty feet less than that of any other bridge on the Mississippi for the benefit of a railroad company?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Why we have required some companies to build bridges of one hundred and sixty feet span I am not advised. I only say that there has been a bridge built at this point with one hundred and twenty feet span which all practical men tell us obstructs the commerce of the river very slightly indeed; and the question is, whether we will tear it down because the expense will come upon a railroad company, and because some of the Lynn shoemakers may be stockholders in that company.

Mr. ALLEY. They are not.

Mr. SCOFIELD. My friend from Massachusetts tells me they are not. I was rather surprised that a gentleman who is indebted to the school-houses of New England and to the economy of the home farm for all he is, and who has gone out into the West, should cast a reflection upon the capital acquired by industry, even upon the shoemaker's bench.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not understand the gentleman's allusion, particularly as I am pleading in behalf of the Lynn shoemakers. I want to give them cheap provisions.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Let us bring provisions then from beyond the Mississippi, from the vast unoccupied prairies, that can grow millions of bushels of wheat every year; let us bring them across the Mississippi, and not force our western commerce when it comes to that stream either to run down to New Orleans or up to Galena.

Mr. ALLEY. I propose to occupy a few minutes in reply to some of the points made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN;] and then I shall call the previous question, and if it be sustained I give notice to gentlemen that I shall occupy but a very small portion of the hour to which I shall be entitled, and I will give them the privilege of speaking.

Mr. Speaker, this case is all in a nut-shell. The gentleman from Illinois has said a great deal about the unfairness of the presentation of this bill. I will say upon that point that the committee went into a very patient investigation, which lasted several weeks. We examined any number of witnesses on both sides, and after hearing all that could be said by all the parties in interest, and those also who are not interested, engineers and others, the committee, although not agreeing entirely as to the expediency of bridging the Mississippi at all, were unanimously of the opinion that, so far as this bridge is concerned, if any bridge is to be built across the Mississippi river, this bridge is most certainly right and proper, and Congress having settled the question that it is indispensably necessary to bridge the Mississippi, we felt that it was our duty to present this measure again to the consideration of the House.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] resides in and represents Galena, and that, I presume, with him is the whole point in the case; that, I suppose, is his whole ground of opposition. It is a sectional question. It is a question which he thinks bears immediately and adversely upon the interests of his constituents, and so he comes in here and opposes with all his might this bill upon that ground. I cannot think that any fair-minded and impartial person who has examined this subject fully and candidly, and has investigated it as fully as this committee have done, can be opposed to this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman inform the House whether the parties opposed to the bridge have been before the committee?

Mr. ALLEY. I cannot yield to the gentleman. I want to reply to one other point made by the gentleman.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order. I submit whether it is in order for the gentleman to suggest that those who differ with him in opinion are dishonest.

The SPEAKER. That is clearly personal and out of order.

Mr. ALLEY. I meant no reflection upon any gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. The Chair rules upon the question of order, that it is not proper for the gentleman from Massachusetts to suggest that gentlemen who differ with him are dishonest.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. The gentleman said that he could not conceive how any man could be honest in opposing this bill.

The SPEAKER. That language is not parliamentary under the rules.

Mr. ALLEY. It is sufficient for me to say to the gentleman that I meant no such thing. I respect the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] as much as any gentleman upon this floor. I will only say that he is a very ardent advocate for anything that favors his constituents, and a fierce opponent of all measures adverse to their interests. I think he will concur with me in that opinion. If that is a charge of dishonesty I do not so understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALLEY. I cannot yield now. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] asks a question, which I admit is a very pertinent one. He asks why do we permit this bridge to have a span of only one hundred and twenty feet? I will answer that question fairly and candidly. Congress, at its last session, enacted a bill allowing several bridges to be built across the Mississippi river, but requiring them to have a span of one hundred and sixty feet. Now, I suppose that at some points a span of one hundred and sixty feet is indispensable, if you are seeking to have the least possible obstruction to the free navigation of the river. There are other points at which a span of one hundred and twenty feet is sufficiently ample. And I think the committee were unanimously of the opinion that this point was one where a span of one hundred and twenty feet was all that was required, all that was necessary; for it appears by the sworn testimony, which was not contradicted, that this bridge crosses the river at the best point for a bridge between St. Louis and St. Paul.

Now, this bridge has a span of one hundred and twenty feet, a wider span than existed in the world twenty-five years ago; and we believe it is all that is necessary at that point. The bridge is now built; all acknowledge that it is the best structure of the kind that was ever erected on this continent. I believe there is no dispute about that among those who have examined it. This bridge was built in good faith, under the authority of acts of the Legislatures of Illinois and Iowa. The gentlemen say if they had had time they could have brought here direct instructions from their Legislature to vote against this bill. What! after the Legislature has granted the privilege of erecting this bridge they will come forward after the bridge has been built and instruct their Representatives to vote against it? I think that cannot be.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALLEY. I will yield by and by. I think I have met that assertion satisfactorily as far as it goes. Now, the bridge having been built in good faith, of a requisite span for that point, built at an enormous expense, which span cannot now be changed without the demolition of the bridge, I think it is not unreasonable that the committee should have reported this bill as it is, although requiring, as the gentleman remarks, a larger span for other bridges hereafter to be erected, some of them at points where the current is more rapid, and where two hundred feet even would not make the navigation as free and safe as it is through these draws of only one hundred and twenty feet span. This bridge has been in operation two years, with an immense and constantly increasing traffic over it, and no accidents worth mentioning have occurred; and can it be possible that the Congress of the United States will subject it to the possibility of removal or destruction to gratify the whims or local prejudices of interested parties. If I had time I would like to give the statistics showing how immensely important it is to the interests of that section that transportation be allowed by continuous rail across that river, and also how small the steamboat interest is in comparison, and how little the boat interest suffers from any detention in consequence of that bridge. The river is blocked with ice four months in the year, and this impediment alone furnishes an unanswerable argument in favor of the bridge, for the additional expense and delay in the transportation of merchandise across the river at that season amounts to many times more than the whole amount of expense and delay occasioned to the boat navigation the year through.

I now call for the previous question, and if it is sustained I promise to give to gentlemen all the time they may desire.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the previous question will be voted down. Let us see if the people cannot be heard here.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division, there were—ayes 69, noes 31.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for tellers.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes ten; noes not counted.

So, one fifth of a quorum not voting in the affirmative, tellers were not ordered.

The previous question was seconded accordingly, and the main question ordered.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLEY. I believe I am entitled to one hour to close the debate before the vote is taken upon the passage of the bill. I now yield to my colleague upon the committee, [Mr. FARQUHAR.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the gentleman yields I would like to ask him a single question.

Mr. ALLEY. Very well.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has any legal proceeding been commenced to have this bridge taken down?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Yes, there has been.

Mr. HENDERSON. My question is, whether there have been any legal proceedings commenced to have this bridge torn down and removed.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I can answer the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. HENDERSON.] There is a case now pending before the United States district court of Iowa.

Mr. ALLEY. There was no testimony before the committee to that effect. It was alleged that such was the fact, but it was denied before the committee.

Mr. HOGAN. The difficulty has been to find out the parties to be sued.

Mr. ALLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FARQUHAR.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to call the attention of the House for a few moments to the facts connected with this proposition as it comes before the House to-day and as it came before the House at the last session. This question of legalizing the Clinton bridge across the Mississippi river and making it a post route was submitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads early after the commencement of the last session of this Congress, and for six months that committee gave it their calm and deliberate attention. Time and again they met and had this question before them. They examined witnesses in large numbers, and had all the facts in testimony before them. After the serious and deliberate examination which, as an impartial committee, they should give to the subject, they come in here and say to the House that they believe, after hearing all the testimony and all the facts, that there has been no "material obstruction" to the navigation of the waters of the great Mississippi by reason of the construction of this bridge.

Now, I undertake to say that that is the question and the only question that is submitted to this House by this bill, and I was surprised at the speech made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] at the last session, and the speech made to-day by him, charging that this bridge is an obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi.

Sir, the gentlemen from Illinois [Messrs. WASHBURN and HARDING] and the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HOGAN,] Representatives in this House, were repeatedly before the committee during the last session and were heard upon this question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman whether we have been heard before the committee this session or have had any notice that this measure was pending?

Mr. FARQUHAR. No, sir; and there was no occasion that those gentlemen should be heard or notified, because the committee had agreed at the last session that this bill should be reported as a separate proposition, independent of all other questions connected with bridging the Mississippi. The chairman of the committee took it upon himself, when "the mammoth bill" was before the House, to move as an amendment this bill substantially; but he did not move it as a separate and independent measure, as it comes before the House to-day. He now presents this measure by instruction of the committee, made prior to the adjournment of Congress at the last session, and by the committee reaffirmed during the present session. Sir, I ask is it the duty of a committee of this House to go round and hunt up the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] and ask him whether they shall report to this House a measure which the committee has calmly and deliberately decided to report?

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the committee who reported this bill did not persistently require of companies that sought legal authority to build bridges over the Mississippi (this bridge having been built without legal authority) that there should be a draw of at least one hundred and sixty feet.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I answer the gentleman with pleasure. The committee required no such thing from any bridge company or their friends. On the contrary, the committee refused to recommend the passage of that "mammoth bill." They directed their chairman to report it to the House without any recommendation whatever, while, at the same time, having for six long months examined carefully, deliberately, and impartially the evidence adduced before them, they did direct him to report this bill with a favorable recommendation, because the evidence was overwhelming that this bridge was no obstruction to the free navigation of that river.

Now, sir, I desire to say that the provisions of the "mammoth bill," which was supported by my friends from Illinois, [Messrs. WASHBURN and HARDING,] was identical in its provisions with the present bill, except that that bill required a draw of one hundred and sixty feet while this has a draw only of one hundred and twenty feet.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is the whole question.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I know it; and to that point I desire to call the attention of the House. This proposition declares, first, that the bill is to be considered a lawful structure and a post route; second, that no higher charges for transportation of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States shall be made for crossing the bridge than the rate per mile paid for transportation over the roads leading to said bridge; third, that the draw shall be promptly opened on reasonable signal, except when trains are passing over the same, but in no case shall there be unnecessary delay during or after the passage of trains; fourth, litigation that may arise from alleged obstruction to navigation may be tried by the circuit court of the United States in either State that the bridge touches; fifth, the right to alter and amend the act to prevent or remove material obstruction to navigation of the river is expressly reserved to Congress.

Everything that was in that bill, which met the almost unanimous support of this Congress at the last session, is embraced in this bill, except that this bridge is to be legalized and made a post road with a draw of only one hundred and twenty feet, while the former bill required that the bridges hereafter built shall have a draw of one hundred and sixty feet. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois asks the question, "Why do you not require this draw to be one hundred and sixty feet?" Sir, we do not require it because the structure is built. It is there, a monument of the enterprise and genius of those men who have sunk their money deep down in the bed of the Mississippi that the constituents of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois may reap the benefits of that rivalry which is afforded in carrying their products to market either through the city of Chicago to the city of New York, or on the "Father of Waters" to the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. Speaker, permit me to call attention to the facts connected with this bridge. I do not state them merely from personal observation, but I state them as proved before the committee. I know the gentleman from Illinois produced before that committee certificates from steamboat men, from pilots, from men interested in the navigation of the Mississippi river and sworn to by them; but we had before us not only men connected with the navigation of the Mississippi river, but men who had been brought from other sections of the country, entirely disinterested pilots, steamboat men, and raftsmen, who had been called there by parties interested in the bridge to investigate and examine whether it was or not a material obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river. We had their evidence. We took it, together with that of the men who were interested in the navigation of the river; and taking it altogether, there was no doubt in the minds of the committee it was overwhelmingly proved there was no material obstruction to the navigation of the river.

The gentleman has read in the hearing of the House to-day a certificate as sworn to, where it is alleged the piers of that bridge are not parallel with the current of the river. I unhesitatingly say those gentlemen are mistaken in regard to that fact. The evidence is clear and satisfactory that the piers are set directly parallel with the current of the stream. This is the fact, as the evidence of Mr. Taylor, the engineer of its construction, clearly shows, who is sustained and confirmed by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and other gentlemen of this House, who actually saw for themselves that these men were entirely mistaken in regard to the matter. The bridge itself is not at right angles to the banks of the river. The current runs differently from the general course of the stream at this point, and no competent engineer would construct a bridge across so important a river without planting his piers parallel with its current.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How about the Rock Island bridge?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I know nothing about it except from the testimony before the committee, and that was slight. My information is from the gentleman from Illinois in the speech he made here last winter, and I would like, if I had the time, to show the House the misrepresentations, the misstatements, the misunderstandings, I presume, of the gentleman in regard to the Rock Island bridge, as applied by him to the Clinton bridge on a former occasion.

Mr. GRINNELL. Let me say a word in reference to the Rock Island bridge.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I do not yield, as I cannot spare the time. I desire to say in this connection that there was evidence before the committee that impartial and disinterested men from other portions of the country tried experiments by floats upon the river, giving them free way in the current, and the result was that they went clear of the piers and between them, showing that the current of the stream was directly parallel with the length of the piers.

The gentleman from Illinois says that hereafter from fifteen to twenty barges will be towed by a single boat from the headwaters of the Mississippi to the Gulf without breaking bulk, but he forgets or omits to say that steamboat men only place one barge upon each side of a boat, the others being towed to the rear, and that the bridge affords ample space for that purpose.

But there is stronger evidence than that to sustain this case. The bridge was completed in December, 1864, more than two years since, and there is not a case of damage or injury established, with a single exception, during the whole period of time from then until now. No material obstruction whatever has resulted from the construction of this bridge to the navigation of the Mississippi river. While the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] charges that sixty barges and boats have been destroyed at Rock Island bridge, the gentleman has not dared to charge before this House to-day that more than a single craft has been injured at this bridge. And, sir, there are suspicions it was run against the bridge to make an experimental case to test whether it was a legal structure or not. Yet the gentleman would ask the committee to come into the House and in the face of sworn evidence, and after deliberate examination, to decide it was an obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river. We could not do it and serve our constituents; we could not do it and serve our country; we could not do it and stand before this House and the testimony in this case. But we come here impartial and disinterested, as much so as the gentleman can be, taking the facts as they came before the committee. This bridge is one of the finest structures, not only in America, but in the world. It cost over five hundred thousand dollars, and the whole purpose of the gentleman seems to be to tear it down because it belongs to an incorporated railroad company.

My friend says the House decided at the last session that these bridges should be one hundred and sixty feet span. Ay; and suppose the gentleman from Illinois had favored a change during the war of the standard height of enlisted men, would he therefore, because of the increased height, discharge all the rest of the men who had been taken into the service whose height did not reach that standard? Yet that is the principle he proposes to apply to this bridge case. Because Congress required in anticipation of the fact that there might be a time when that length of span would be required, he proposes to tear down this bridge which has a span of less than one hundred and sixty feet. I would say to that gentleman, Bide your time, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Let me say to the House that when this bridge was being constructed the railroad company whose road now passes over it were seeking a terminus on the Missouri river, and they employed engineers to examine and report upon it. They reported that the draw of this bridge, which is one hundred and twenty feet, was then the widest span for a railroad bridge known in the civilized world. Now these men, knowing that fact, believed that it was all that would be required. They built this bridge, a structure so substantial and so permanent, reflecting such a credit on those who built it, that it would be doing gross injustice to them, to the country, and to the commerce thereof to refuse that protection guaranteed by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. I desire to ask the gentleman whether this bridge was not built by the permission of the States of Illinois and Iowa?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I understand, from the evidence, that the bridge was built by permission of the Legislature of the State of Illinois and in conformity to the general law on the subject of the State of Iowa. These gentlemen came there and pursued the only legal course marked out by law and constructed that bridge. And now a word on the question of detention. I venture to say that no boat was ever detained in passing through that bridge over two or three minutes. There is no further detention than that necessary. It is opened by a steam-engine, and takes but two or three minutes to open and close the draw.

The SPEAKER. The time yielded by the gentleman from Massachusetts to the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask the gentleman to allow me a few moments more.

Mr. ALLEY. I cannot do it, because I have promised to yield the floor to several other gentlemen.

Mr. FARQUHAR. If the gentleman has to break his promise, he may as well break it in my favor. He told me that he would yield me the control of the floor after calling the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield me the floor for ten minutes?

Mr. ALLEY. I will yield to the gentleman for that time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am very reluctant indeed to occupy the attention of the House one moment longer upon this bill, but it is a public duty which I feel to be incumbent on me to resist, by every means in my power, the passage of this most iniquitous measure. I do not see why the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARQUHAR] should be surprised to find me in opposition to this measure. The gentleman ought to know that he always finds me upon the side of the people and against this outrageous legislation in favor of monopolies and against the people. I am against everything of this kind, and I submit to the House that the gentleman from Indiana has not answered the arguments which I submitted to the House. I submit that he has traveled from the record and talked about other things than the question before the House. The gentleman from Indiana, I suppose, was one of this junketing party that went over this bridge, [Mr. FARQUHAR nodded assent,] and that he saw the bridge and saw that it was an obstruction to navigation, and I am astonished that my honorable friend, with his undoubted veracity and high character, should here, in the face of this House, undertake to say that this bridge, in the light of the testimony of fifteen witnesses, is no obstruction. Sir, what was the testimony before the committee? I have read it—against the bridge the testimony of credible witnesses, in a situation to know the facts, but on the other side interested parties of men who have a pecuniary interest in these measures, while the great people who are interested are left out in the cold and have no voice.

Now, as to my distinguished friend from New York, [Mr. DAVIS,] who, in the first place, wrote a similar bill, I understand that he is directly interested in the passage of this bill, being a stockholder in this company. I understand that my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] has also an interest somewhere in this direction; but I represent no stockholders or railroad combinations, but the people.

Mr. ALLEY. When the gentleman speaks of a gentleman from Massachusetts as having an interest in this matter, does he refer to me?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. When he alluded to the gentleman from New York did he refer to me?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I supposed the gentleman from New York had an interest in this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will tell him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman can do it after my ten minutes expire. I cannot allow him to interrupt me now.

Sir, considering the stupendous interest that this corporation has, it is no wonder that after this measure was defeated by fifteen or twenty majority at the last session of Congress it has, like the fabled Antæus, risen from its fall and appeared here at this session. Sir, as Representatives of the people we ought to interpose our veto against a measure of this kind, but alas! too often it is in vain.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] has given us no reason why we should make a discrimination in favor of this bridge over every other bridge on the river. None can be given except the one to relieve the railroad companies from their liability to make it conform to the requirements of other bridges. We have said by our law that no bridge should be built with a span of less than one hundred and sixty feet, have we not? Then why make an exception in this case, unless it be at the behest of this Albany corporation, the "Albany Regency," and these railroad corporations? Tell me why.

Mr. ALLEY. The bridge is already built.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman says the bridge is already built. Yes, sir, they built a bridge which is an obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi, and they know it. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FARQUHAR,] in reply to me, said I could give no instance of this bridge acting as an obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river. I say to the gentleman that there have been numerous instances in which, as I can prove by incontrovertible testimony, this bridge, it is estimated, has indirectly been a damage of more than half a million dollars to the people of the Northwest; that I know. And yet because it is owned by these corporations, and they have built a bridge which is an obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi, they rush here and ask us to do, what? Not to leave the bridge in its present status, with its character to be determined by the courts, but they come here and ask us to legalize their illegal act, that is what they do. Now I ask the Representatives of the people if they are prepared to do this? Why did not the committee bring in a report setting forth all the facts?

Mr. FARQUHAR. They have a report.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If there is any such report, why has it not been read? No report has been read here, and we have nothing before us but the statements of gentlemen. Now I have the sworn testimony of sixteen witnesses, whose testimony cannot be refuted, that this bridge is a great obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river. I ask the House if they have no regard for the interests of the people? Do gentlemen know what this bill really means? Do they know the hostility and power of these railroad corporations in reference to every means of transportation except such as they themselves control? They want to close up the Mississippi in order to drive everything to go over their roads, and not permit us to have any outlets for our products except over their roads.

Now, this very corporation for the benefit of which we are asked to legislate, this very Northwestern Railroad Company, is charging my constituents from twenty to thirty cents per bushel for carrying their corn to our nearest market by railroad, the market of Chicago. And yet the corporation comes here and demands of us to legislate for its particular benefit, while our suffering constituents have no voice in the matter and cannot be heard here. Let the people have a chance to be heard.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] must have known that I was deceived in regard to this thing; he must have known that I had a right to presume that this was a matter foreclosed by the action of the last Congress; he must have known that my constituents and the people of the Northwest would want to be heard if this matter should come up again. How is it in Massachusetts, and even in Indiana? Do you not there give the people an opportunity to be heard upon all such questions as this? When the Legislature of Indiana proposes to obstruct the navigation of any stream in the State do they not give the people a hearing? How is it in the State of Massachusetts? There you have in the Legislature a committee on corporations and bridges. Does the Massachusetts Legislature take up and pass upon a matter in the interest of a few men who want to be corporators without allowing the people to be heard? No, sir, they never did any such thing. Massachusetts legislates honorably, understandingly, and justly. I would like to see the committee of the Massachusetts Legislature that would undertake to get a bill through as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] is trying to get this through here.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] having justified himself to his constituents, which I suppose was all he desired or intended to do, I shall not occupy the attention of the House many minutes, and will then give way to other gentlemen who desire to occupy the rest of my time. Now, in regard to the flourish of the gentleman about some testimony he holds in his hand, a page or two of the statements of pilots, steamboat-owners, and others who are directly interested—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How interested?

Mr. ALLEY. I would say that he refers to that as all the testimony as if by implication the committee, some how or other, had suppressed the remainder of the testimony. Now, I hold in my hand ten times as much testimony, sworn testimony also, from interested and disinterested parties, which testimony is of a character directly opposed to that which the gentleman from Illinois has presented; and if it is desired that the whole shall be read I certainly shall have no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that it be read, and I ask that the additional testimony given by my colleague and myself before that committee be also read.

Mr. ALLEY. The House, I am sure, after hearing the testimony read, would come to the conclusion, as the committee did, that no stronger case was ever made out. The committee unanimously came to the conclusion, as I have already stated, that if any bridge under any circumstances was to be built, this was a bridge eminently worthy of the protection of the Congress of the United States.

With these remarks I will yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. FARQUHAR.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, &c., That the bridges across the Ohio river at Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, and at Bridgeport, in the State of Ohio, abutting on Zane's Island in said river, are hereby declared to be lawful structures in their present position and elevation, and shall be so held and taken to be, anything in any law or laws of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding."

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said bridges are declared to be and are established post roads for the passage of the mails of the United States, and that the Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company are authorized to have and maintain their said bridges at their present site and elevation, and the officers and crews of all vessels and boats navigating said river are required to regulate the use of their said vessels and boats, and of any pipes or chimneys belonging thereto, so as not to interfere with the elevation and construction of said bridges."

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I present that to the consideration of the House as the final result of the controversy arising out of the great Wheeling bridge case, to which I call the attention of my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] I ask the House whether this bridge company or its representatives are not asking but a comparatively small privilege when the great body of the people authorized the legislation read for that bridge at Wheeling, after that long controversy, not only legalizing it as a post road, but declaring that its height, its length, and its breadth should all be legalized, while in this case there is reserved to the Congress of the United States the power to remove this bridge whenever it may be found to be a "material obstruction to the navigation of the river?"

Now, sir, there runs out from the city of Chicago to the city of Rock Island, just sixty miles south of the Clinton bridge, a railroad. There runs from the city of Chicago, just forty miles above this bridge, at Dubuque, another railroad, near the end of which resides my distinguished friend from Illinois; thus there are three railroads passing over that magnificent prairie, coming somewhat in competition with each other. Yet the gentleman tells us that he is in favor of breaking down monopolies, while at the same time he is urging that we shall take away from the people of that portion of Iowa and that portion of Illinois one of these rival lines of transportation by tearing down this magnificent bridge and destroying that great thoroughfare.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is my proposition?

Mr. FARQUHAR. The gentleman's proposition is, that the bridge shall be lengthened in its span; and to do that it must be torn down to its foundation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let it conform to the requirements applied to every other bridge.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Well, this is a singular proposition: that we shall do away with competition to increase the price of products. When you create competition in transportation you reduce its price, and thereby increase the price of products. Let me say that this great Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company may be a monopoly; I know nothing about that; but I do know that it has, by its energy and capital, reached out its arms over twelve hundred miles of that great north-western country, opening up facilities by which the products gathered from all parts of that country may be carried to the markets for which they are destined.

That railroad now reaches four hundred and ninety eight miles, from the city of Chicago to the city of Council Bluffs, upon the great Missouri river. The great Pacific railroad has now reached three hundred miles further up the valley of the Platte, and is looking toward the Rocky mountains, which it will reach during the coming year. Yet the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, the representative of the people of the West, comes here and asks this Congress to tear down this bridge which is to carry over it the great trade which not only comes from the valley between the Mississippi river and the Rocky mountains, but from the far Pacific coast—ay, from that celestial empire which is to contribute countless millions of passengers and tons of freight over this magnificent bridge which the gentleman proposes to tear down because this corporation is, in his excited imagination, a "great monopoly."

Mr. ALLISON. The gentleman from Massachusetts has promised to yield to me.

Mr. ALLEY. My distinguished friend from Ohio wants just one minute, and I cannot refuse so modest a request.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, with due thanks to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] for his courtesy in allowing me one minute of his time, I will endeavor to confine myself within that limit. This I can the easier do because I have no speech to make on either side of this question. But some gentlemen around me find it difficult to comprehend why a bill affecting the use or continuance of a bridge should give occasion to so much excited feeling and fierce discussion; and I think I can relate a little incident which may possibly furnish the explanation.

Mr. Speaker, I live in the Miami valley, that loveliest and most fertile part of all Ohio. We had a great freshet there last September. I was away from home at the time making speeches—for it was during the late political canvass—for the benefit of Copperheads in another part of the State. I witnessed, therefore, none of the ravages of the great flood, except as I saw some of the effects and traces of it after my return. But my neighbors described it to me, and told me of the damage to farms, crops, fences, and other property, and related to me many interesting and some amusing incidents and personal adventures connected with the general calamity. A day or two after my return a friend said to me: "By the way, SCHENCK, the old bridge over the Miami at Hamilton was carried off." "Is that so?" I asked. "Well, beside the serious inconvenience of that loss, it must have distressed our Butler county neighbors greatly, for to my certain knowledge that venerable structure has stood for fifty years and was perhaps the oldest bridge in our valley." "You may well say that," remarked my friend. "There was excitement enough in the crowd that stood and looked on at the old thing as it was lifted from the piers and swung round and floated down stream. I was there and saw tears almost come into Bill Beckett's eyes." (Mr. Beckett, by the way, Mr. Speaker, is as true, liberal, and noble a man as ever lived, and will enjoy the story.) "That is not to be wondered at," said I; "Beckett might well be affected. He was born near by, has been familiar with the bridge always since his earliest boyhood, and must have had a good many pleasant associations connected with it." "Associations the devil," exclaimed my matter-of-fact neighbor; "why, Bill was one of the biggest stockholders in the bridge company!" [Great laughter.]

Mr. ALLEY. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me the eulogy pronounced upon railroad companies and the great benefits growing out of the construction of railroads is not pertinent to the question before the House. I agree, sir, with the gentlemen who are advocating the advantages growing out of these railroad companies. I am in favor of as liberal a course of legislation as any man upon this floor; but I cannot understand why we should legalize a railroad structure erected in defiance of law. I understand this company can have this bridge, and the question simply is the expending a few thousand dollars to make the bridge conform to the law of the land. While I would not interfere with the advantageous and laudable efforts of gentlemen to construct these railroads, still, as a matter of principle, I desire to protest against this habit of railroad corporations manipulating State corporations in the way which they so well understand.

I object, Mr. Speaker, to corporations going to the Legislature of the State, manipulating it and getting such measures passed as they see fit, and then, because they conflict with the laws of the United States, coming to Congress and asking us to legalize what they knew to be when it was erected an illegal structure. As a matter of principle I object, because I know nothing of the merits of this particular case. I protest against such legislation as will justify and form a precedent for similar legislation hereafter.

When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPOFFIELD] says he is inclined to regret Providence has given us the Mississippi river if objections are to be made to railroad connections, I beg to remind him that one hundred railroads would not carry the commerce of that river if its navigation were unimpeded. That right of navigation belongs to the people of this country, and I say that no railroad corporation, and not even Congress itself, can step in between the people and their rights.

Mr. Speaker, this bridge is a serious obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river; it ought not to be allowed to exist; and if it is not a serious obstruction to the navigation of that river, then they need not come here and ask for our action. The bridge will stand if not a serious obstruction to navigation, and if it is I repeat it ought not to be allowed. And I desire to protest against corporations calling upon Congress to step in to legalize what has already been done illegally. I do not want railroad corporations to do these things, relying upon the Congress of the United States to step in to their relief. I protest against it, not because I am opposed to this particular object, but as a matter of precedent and practice I object to any such legislation.

Mr. ALLEY. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say, by way of explanation, what I intended to say before the previous question was seconded. I do not know personally whether this bridge is a material obstruction to navigation or not, but I know that experts—pilots and captains—on that river do regard it as such. I am aware that engineers on these railroads insist that it is otherwise. Now, if it is no obstruction there can of course be no objection to this legislation. But what I desired to say was that legislation on this matter should be postponed until we could have an opportunity of seeing and reading a report from a distinguished engineer of the Army, General Warren, who within three months has made a full and complete examination of this bridge, and who has no interest either in favor of the railroad or of the river navigation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They dare not trust that.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore it is I desired to say a word by way of appeal to my distinguished friend to wait until we can have an opportunity of seeing the report of that engineer. And I desire, furthermore, to say that if that distinguished engineer should find that this bridge is an obstruction to navigation, then there should be a proviso attached to this bill whereby this corporation within a reasonable time should be required to so reconstruct its bridge as to make the navigation safe and free.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would ask the gentleman to state to the House whether the question of the location of this bridge was or was not referred to that gentleman by Congress, and I anticipate his answer by saying that it was not.

Mr. ALLISON. I will only say that by the resolution of Congress this whole question was referred to the engineering bureau of the War Department, and that distinguished general has made this examination personally; and therefore it is that I desire there should be a proviso inserted in this bill substantially like this:

Provided, That the said bridge shall, upon the recommendation of the chief engineer of the Army, within five years from the passage of this act be so reconstructed as to make it conform to the provisions of an act to authorize the construction of certain bridges, and to establish them as post roads, approved July 28, 1866.

Mr. ALLEY. Does not the gentleman know that all the engineers whose attention has been called to this bridge are of the opinion that it will not obstruct navigation? And is not the gentleman himself sufficiently conversant with the facts of the case to be warranted in believing that it will not?

Mr. ALLISON. I do know that distinguished engineers say it is not an obstruction to navigation. But though it may not be an obstruction to navigation to-day, it may be an obstruction five years hence; and therefore I think there should be some power somewhere to require this corporation to so change the construction from time to time as to leave this great natural highway to the Gulf of Mexico free and uninterrupted for the navigation of steamboats. And more than that. I now make my remarks in opposition to the bill, by way of explanation of what I proposed in the beginning rather than for the purpose of trying at this stage to amend it. There is another provision in the bill which I object to, and it is this: this bill authorizes and requires steamboats above the bridge to give a reasonable signal before the draw shall be passed. Now, I do not know what may be construed to be a reasonable signal, or who is to make the construction of the law; therefore I think there should be a more specific statute with reference to the present duties of the engineers and pilots upon those boats, or of the persons who may have charge of the draws.

Mr. ALLEY. One word in reply to a single observation of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] He says that though there may be no obstruction now there may be five years hence, and therefore there should be some power somewhere to remedy such an evil. If the gentleman had listened carefully to the reading of the bill he would have discovered that this power does exist, that it is especially reserved to Congress and to the courts. Therefore that difficulty is all obviated. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] opposes this bill. I want it understood by the House that he does not speak for the whole State of Illinois. The Legislature of Illinois authorized the building of this bridge, and in my opinion a very large majority of the people of the State are in favor of continuing it as it is. The fact seems to be that this bridge was erected six or seven years ago, and during all the time which has since intervened but one single case has been presented to the committee of pretended material obstruction to navigation or damage to a boat. There is a draw to this bridge of one hundred and twenty feet, which, it is claimed, is wide enough for all practical purposes. Every bridge is technically an obstruction to navigation. If you drive a pile or construct a pier, it is, in one sense, technically an obstruction to navigation; boats and rafts have not got the whole surface of the river to float upon; and therefore to say that a bridge shall be constructed so as to be no obstruction to navigation is to say that no bridge shall be constructed at all, and to say that the general commerce of the country passing from west to east shall be obstructed at this huge ditch running north and south through the United States, which shall remain forever as a perpetual barrier to commerce.

Now, sir, there are eight hundred miles of railroad in operation from Chicago westward, and the roads are being extended at the rate of a hundred miles every few months. Shall we say that those roads shall be obstructed at the Mississippi river, and bridges which have been erected, and which are no material obstruction to navigation, shall be torn down and others erected and the people taxed by an additional tariff on freight for their erection, for that would be the consequence? I say no. Why, sir, there are now in the United States twenty-seven thousand miles of railroad in operation, and I would like to show to the House the amount of comparative revenue derived from railroads and steamboats in the United States. In 1865 the railroads paid $5,917,000, while the steamboats of the United States paid only $638,000. In 1866 the railroads paid $7,600,000, while the steamboats paid only half as much as they paid before, only $308,000.

My colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] says that he is representing very large interests, that when he speaks against this bill he is speaking in behalf of an interest of millions of dollars in his district. What does he mean by that? The steamboat interest? Well, how much revenue do you think the steamboat interest in my colleague's district paid in 1865 and 1866? In 1865 they paid the enormous sum of $847, and in 1866 they paid the magnificent sum of $65 90.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I said nothing about the steamboat interest of my district.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I supposed my colleague was representing the people of his district and their interests. It reminds me of a story I once heard of a distinguished judge, now a United States Senator. When on the bench he was greatly annoyed by trifling suits, and when a case of certiorari was before him and he was annoyed and vexed at having to construe a statute, he asked the counsel for the plaintiff how much the case involved, and was told twenty shillings. Said he, "Oh, my God, I would rather pay that amount than have to construe the statute!" And so I think the people had better buy off the opposition of my colleague from the Galena district and have the opposition removed.

Mr. ALLEY. I now yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.] I would gladly have yielded to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS,] who desires to say a few words, but I have not time to do so.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, this bridge about which there appears to be so much contention happens to be in my district—that part of it, at least, which is said to be an obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river. I have lived on the banks of that river for twenty-two years not far from this bridge. I live below it, and I want to say to the members of this House that during the time I have lived there, and since the construction of this bridge, I have not heard of any damage being done to the navigation of the river by it. I wish to say in this connection, in reply to a remark made by some gentlemen last session upon this same bill, that the instance cited of a case of damage done to a raft did not occur at the Clinton bridge, but at the bridge at Davenport. Gentlemen will remember that at the last session of Congress we passed a bill authorizing and directing the removal of that bridge because it was an obstruction to the navigation of the river; and I say now—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield—

Mr. PRICE. I cannot yield now. If I had the time I would yield with a great deal of pleasure, because I know the gentleman is a modest man and scarcely ever takes the floor, unless he is entitled to it. [Laughter.] And more than that, he always speaks in the interest of the people; and when he dies the people's advocate will have gone to

"That bourne whence no traveler returns."

'Sir, there are a few people other than those in Galena who are interested in this matter. There are a few people both east and west of the Mississippi who are interested in having this continent spanned by railroads, so that the Atlantic and the Pacific regions may be bound together by bands of iron. If you stop them at the Mississippi river what will the people East and West do for a convenient means of communication across the continent? Faith without works is dead; and a railroad across the continent without bridges across the rivers is almost useless at some seasons of the year. And I venture to say, that if to-day you were standing upon the banks of the Mississippi river you might remain there shivering unable to get across if there were no bridges. The steamboats cannot run, and the ice is not a safe means of transit; and without a bridge there would be a complete suspension of railroad communication, or of any other kind.

This Clinton bridge differs from the Rock Island bridge in this respect: the Clinton bridge stands in dead water, while the other bridge stands in swift water. This bridge at Clinton stands with the piers parallel with the channel, as the engineers testify; and as the best and strongest argument to the House in favor of the passage of this bill I will say that for all the years this bridge has stood there not a single dollar of damage by it has been brought into the courts for adjudication; and so far as I am aware no damage has been sustained from it up to this time. If there had been, no man upon this floor would be more willing than I would be to remove it or to so change it that it would not be an obstruction.

Now, I was not one of the junketing party to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has referred; nor do I come within the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], and which he illustrated by reference to some Miami bridge. I do not own any stock in this Clinton bridge or in any railroad connected with it, directly or indirectly. So I am clear of all those insinuations. If there was a bridge over the Mississippi river which impeded the navigation of it I would be in favor of its removal. And I shall ask this House before Congress adjourns to make an appropriation to clear out the lower rapids of the grandest river in the world, so as to remove what is now one of the greatest obstructions to its navigation. This bridge is no obstruction to its navigation, and therefore this bill ought to pass.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division, there were—ayes twelve; noes not counted.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, said: I call for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays. I hope gentlemen are not afraid to place themselves upon the record. Let us see who are in favor of monopolies and who are against them.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. ALLEY were appointed. The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes thirty; noes not counted.

So, one fifth voting in the affirmative, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I rise to a question of privilege. I was a member of the board of directors that ordered the construction of this bridge. In order to secure its construction we had to issue bonds, and I am the owner of some of those bonds. Now, as some may regard that as a clear case of interest I ask that I may be excused from voting; and I hope every other member who may be interested will do the same thing.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the member from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] be excused from voting upon this bill.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I will say that if I am compelled to vote I will vote for the bill.

The motion of Mr. THAYER was agreed to; and Mr. WENTWORTH was accordingly excused from voting.

The question recurred upon the passage of the bill; and being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 101, nays 43, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cooper, Culver, Dawes, Defrees, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Koontz, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Maynard, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, Radford, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upton, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Winfield—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Baker, Benjamin, Bromwell, Campbell, Reader, W. Clarke, Cobb, Culom, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Finck, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Johnson, Kelso, Ketcham, Latham, Leftwich, Loan, Marvin, McClurg, Neell, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ross, Shanklin, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, Williams, and James F. Wilson—43.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Conkling, Darling, Davis, Dumont, Eggleston, Eliot, Goodyear, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Ashbel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Jones, Kelley, Ladin, Marshall, McCullough, McIndoe, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Newell, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Wentworth, Woodbridge, and Wright—47.

So, the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. THAYER said: I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. KELLEY, is absent, by leave of the House, on business of the Naval Committee.

When the call of the roll was concluded,

Mr. DAVIS said: I wish to ask to be excused from voting.

The SPEAKER. That request should have been made before the roll-call had commenced. It is too late now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On what ground does the gentleman desire to be excused?

Mr. DAVIS. On this ground: that though I am not interested in this bill, yet as I was not allowed an opportunity to answer the question put to me by the gentleman from Illinois I have not been able to explain that I have no interest.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. SAWYER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed House bill No. 380, to fix the times for the regular meeting of Congress, with an amendment.

Also, House bill No. 508, to amend the organic acts of the Territories of Nebraska, Colorado, Dakota, Montana, Washington, Idaho, Arizona, Utah, and New Mexico, with amendments, in which amendments he was directed to request the concurrence of the House.

Also, a bill (S. No. 494) for the relief of the Winona and St. Peters Railroad Company, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

COMMITTEE ON THE MILITIA.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Messrs. BANKS and VAN AERNAM to fill vacancies upon the Committee on the Militia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order after the morning hour the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service at Washington.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged motion, and move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 61, noes 48.

MEETINGS OF CONGRESS.

The first business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 830) to fix the times for the regular meetings of Congress.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all of section two after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That no person who was a member of the previous Congress shall receive any compensation as mileage for going to or returning from the additional session provided for by the foregoing section.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move that the House non-concur in the amendment. As I understand, it allows constructive mileage.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Well, I would like to understand the effect of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the part proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section seventeen of the act approved July 28, 1866, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," be so amended that no Senator or Representative in Congress who has been a member of the Congress next immediately preceding shall receive any allowance for mileage for traveling to the place of meeting to attend such additional session provided for in the foregoing section.

Mr. WENTWORTH. As I understand, the House bill provided against constructive mileage. The Senate amendment, if I understand it correctly, allows constructive mileage.

A MEMBER. Oh, no; it prohibits it.

Mr. WENTWORTH. If that is the fact, I have nothing further to say.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. WARD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE IN THE TERRITORIES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 508) entitled "An act to amend the organic acts of the Territories of Nebraska, Colorado, Dakota, Montana, Washington, Idaho, Arizona, Utah, and New Mexico."

The amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That from and after the passage of this act there shall be no denial of the elective franchise in any of the Territories of the United States, now or hereafter to be organized, to any citizen thereof on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude; and all acts or parts of acts, either of Congress or the Legislative Assemblies of said Territories, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby declared null and void.

Amend the title of the bill so as to read, "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the Territories of the United States."

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate; and on that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Territories [Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio,] whether or not the provisions of this bill, if it becomes a law, will apply to the Territories of Colorado and Nebraska.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir; while Territories it will apply to them. I now insist on the call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question then recurred on concurring in the amendments of the Senate; and being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 38, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Davis, DeGreese, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Ketcham, Kootz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McRuer, Mercer, M. Per, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Spalding, Stokes, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Eliot B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hise, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Johnson, Latham, Le Blond, Leftwich, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Potter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, Whaley, and Winfield—38.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Blow, Brandegee, Conkling, Darling, Dawes, Dumont, Eliot, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Huburd, Hunter, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Kuykendall, Lufkin, Marshall, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Moorhead, Morris, Newell, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Shellabarger, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Strouse, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Woodbridge, and Wright—49.

So the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

During the vote,

Mr. DEMING stated that his colleague, Mr. BRANDEGEE, was absent by leave of the House, and that if he were present he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. THAYER made a similar statement concerning his colleague, Mr. KELLEY.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, then moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RETRENCHMENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 157, appropriating money to defray the expenses of the joint select committee on retrenchment.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time. It appropriates $15,000 to defray the expenses of witnesses and other expenses of the joint select committee on retrenchment.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I wish to inquire whether this is to be considered as the report of the committee on retrenchment? [Laughter.] It does not look very much like retrenchment. It is the only thing we have heard from that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the labors of this committee have been very much enlarged and many additional subjects have been referred to it. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] chairman of the committee, is absent, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is present and can explain the object of the joint resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the resolution read and was not aware of anything of this kind was on your table. It carries along with it its own explanation. It is simply a provision to pay the expenses of the committee. What the committee have yet done we are not prepared fully to report, although we have reported two or three bills which are now pending in relation to appointments to office.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I ask the gentleman whether the committee has saved the amount now proposed to be drawn from the Treasury?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is more than I am able to say—that has been saved. A large amount of testimony has been taken and a great deal more is to be taken when our legislative duties will permit, which will develop a large amount of fraud and rascality in a variety of shapes by which the members of this Congress may hereafter well be directed in future legislation. I am not prepared to make any report what that testimony is. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 456, for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Before calling the previous question I will say that the Committee on the Territories this morning unanimously directed me to move that the bill be put upon its passage. If the previous question be seconded, I will yield to gentlemen a portion of my time.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will after the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. GARFIELD. I only want half a minute just now.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Very well.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am unwilling to pass, without debate or examination, a bill containing a provision which, if it have any legal effect at all, may become a very troublesome precedent hereafter. Suppose a bill should be offered to-morrow to let South Carolina in on the same condition? I do not express any opinion as to the merits of the bill; but I shall resist the attempt to pass it without examination or debate. To make two new States in ten minutes, under the previous question, without having the bill printed or debated, is unworthy of a deliberative body.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I desire to state that the committee were unanimous in favor of the bill with the exception of the member from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER.]

Mr. FINCK. I wish to inquire of my colleague whether he intends to press through without any discussion a bill of such importance as this.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the House sustains the motion for the previous question I will allow discussion.

Mr. FINCK. If the gentleman will make it a special order and have it discussed—

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; have it discussed.

Mr. FINCK. It is very extraordinary to have a matter of this importance pressed through under the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] state how much time he will allow?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the previous question is sustained I have said I would yield to gentlemen all my time except perhaps five minutes. I will now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I merely wish to appeal to the gentleman not to press this bill to a vote at this time. We have just passed a bill securing to all male citizens of the United States within the Territories the right of suffrage, without distinction of race or color. It is now proposed to pass a bill accepting a constitution for a State government which expressly disfranchises the persons we have just declared by our votes shall be enfranchised. Now, sir, I think, with a question of this kind presented to us, we should not make haste under the previous question to create this new State, and thereby undo our work so far as the colored citizens of Nebraska are concerned.

I know there is a provision in this bill which declares that this act shall only take effect upon the fundamental condition that no person shall be disfranchised on account of race or color; but, sir, if we pass this bill the Territory becomes a State, and there is no consent by the people of the Territory to this condition, either by a vote of the people or by an act of the legislative body of the Territory representing the people. We merely declare that our act of admission shall carry with it as a condition an annulment of one section of the constitution of the State.

Now, sir, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] this may return to plague us when we are asked to pass upon the cases of the southern States. Why not accept South Carolina if this condition can be rendered effective in Nebraska by attaching the same condition to her constitution?

Mr. DAWES. I would like to ask the gentleman what would be the legal effect of a failure on the part of Nebraska to perform this condition subsequent after the passage of this bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why, sir, I think the effect of this provision would be to throw into the courts of the United States the question as to whether the colored citizens are entitled to vote in the new State of Nebraska.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire further if it would not also raise the question whether upon the refusal to perform this condition subsequent Nebraska is any longer a State. And I would suggest here whether it is worth while for us in one hour under the previous question, in an hour distributed out by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to those who may desire to discuss it five or ten minutes, to pass upon this new fundamental feature in the admission of States to this Union, whether a condition subsequent can be attached at all to the admission. I wish the gentleman would address himself to that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I can only give my opinion in reference to this point. I have no doubt that this provision would have no effect whatever.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will hear the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. This condition meets my hearty concurrence if incorporated into the constitution of the State of Nebraska; but I desire that it shall be incorporated into the constitution of the State of Nebraska by the legislation of this House, and I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to let us fully understand this question, and whether we are accomplishing what we wish to accomplish in this matter. This is, to my mind, a very grave question, a question which I desire to see discussed more than it can be discussed in one hour under the operation of the previous question, that time being distributed among the members of the House by the gentleman from Ohio. It is deserving of the further and calmer and more deliberate discussion in this House, because it affects the condition and status not only of the State of Nebraska but of every other State in this Union, and of those States also which are knocking at the door to be admitted into this Union. The gentleman cannot surely comprehend and appreciate the magnitude of the question he is springing upon us under the previous question, and I hope he will permit us to discuss it more deliberately than we can do in the hour which will be left to him after the previous question is sustained.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the House will set apart to-morrow after the morning hour for the consideration of this bill and the one for the admission of Colorado as special orders, I have no objection to further discussion.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent, but otherwise the bill in regard to appointments to office and the banking bill, and several other special orders, would take precedence.

Mr. BLAINE. If it requires unanimous consent I object.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to inquire if the bill in relation to the Electoral College is not also a special order for to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. That is also a special order, and there are several others. The Chair only mentioned the prominent ones on which discussion is expected.

Mr. MORRILL. Make these bills the special order for Monday next.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Is there a special order for Monday next?

The SPEAKER. There are a number of special orders that would be ahead of this.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Cannot I have the unanimous consent of the House that these bills shall be the special order for Monday?

Mr. BLAINE and Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then I will try the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it not in order to move to refer this bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] is upon the floor now, having withdrawn the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman has distinctly renewed the demand for the previous question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the demand for the previous question be withdrawn, will it not then be in order to move a reference of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I move to refer it to the Committee on the Territories.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] being entitled to the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I have already said that the Committee on the Territories, with one exception, unanimously instructed me to put this bill upon its passage.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I want to ask the chairman of that committee this question: If this bill is passed with this condition—subsequent, which attaches no penalty or forfeiture for violation of the condition on the State of Nebraska, will it not be a nullity, or how will it affect the status of that State when once admitted?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. That will be a question for the courts to determine.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to answer my own question if the gentleman declines to answer it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield the floor?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. No, sir; I ask the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion has priority over the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FINCK. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. That motion will kill the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I want to kill it and all such bills.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 41, nays 106, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Blaine, Boyer, Campbell, Chautau, Cooper, Dawson, Demson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, Edwin H. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Lettwich, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel T. Taylor, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, and Winfield—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Davis, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farguhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James B. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Ketchum, Keontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, Mercur, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Spalding, Stokes, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Wagner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—106.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Beaman, Blow, Brandegee, Conkling, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Dumont, Eliot, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Jones, Kelley, Kuykendall, Laffin, Marshall, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Moorhead, Morris, Newell, Phelps, Pomeroy, Rousseau, Shelabarger, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Windom, Woodbridge, and Wright—44.

The question recurred upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would inquire for information: If the call for the previous question fails to be seconded will the bill then be open for debate and amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will, or for commitment.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the House will grant me, for the consideration of the Nebraska and Colorado bills, some one day next week, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I will consent to a postponement of this bill till that time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to any such arrangement.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then I insist upon my call for the previous question upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 61, noes 68.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, and Mr. INGERSOLL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes forty-seven.

Before the noes were counted, Mr. INGERSOLL said: The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] gives up the count.

The SPEAKER. After the House has ordered tellers upon a question no member can give up the count; but the tellers must perform their duty.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There were sixty-five in the negative.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would ask if the tellers have performed their full duty?

The SPEAKER. Strictly speaking the duty of the tellers was not fully performed; but by unanimous consent the House can regard the announcement made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] one of the tellers, that there were sixty-five voting in the negative, as a sufficient count.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. There were some twenty members waiting to pass between the tellers who were not counted. I insist that there shall be a full count made and reported by the tellers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again appoint tellers. Mr. ORR, of Indiana, and Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, will please act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 39, noes 73.

So the call for the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now move that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. For what purpose?

Mr. BLAINE. I want to move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] so as to have this bill referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I desire to make that motion for the reason that the Committee on the Territories have already told us plainly that they have made up their minds. They have given us their unanimous verdict, and the House does not sustain it. The point at issue is a law point, and should properly be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will yield to allow the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to move his amendment to my motion, and then the House can dispose of it as they may think proper.

Mr. BLAINE. I now move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Illinois so that this bill may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and upon that motion I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. If the call for the previous question should be seconded and the main question ordered, then, if the motion to refer should be voted down, the previous question will not be exhausted till the third reading of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I withdraw the call for the previous question, and insist upon my motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It is very evident that the House desires to discuss this bill. Now, if the House will grant me a day for the consideration of this bill I will fix the day for that purpose; I will have no objection to its postponement and discussion. All I want is to have a day named upon which I can have a vote upon this bill.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio will be adopted. There can be nothing fairer than the course which he proposes. He has done all that he can do in this matter; and I trust the House will now fix some time for the consideration of this important measure.

Mr. BLAINE. Let the bill take its regular order as it may come from the committee on call. I object to making it a special order, which, I believe, requires unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that it will require unanimous consent to make this a special order to take precedence of anterior special orders.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. When a special order is reached can it not be postponed by a majority vote?

The SPEAKER. It can. But at the present time the House is not engaged in the consideration of any special order; therefore the motion to postpone a special order could not be made now.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to withdraw his amendment to the motion to refer. I do so for this reason: the Committee on the Judiciary now have on hand more business than they can possibly get through with during this session; they will be compelled in a short time to ask leave to sit during the sessions of the House. Therefore I hope this bill will be allowed to take the course usually taken by bills of this character. Let it be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. BLAINE. Let the House, if it chooses, vote down my motion; I cannot consent to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule with regard to the effect of the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Its effects shall be to put an end to all debate, and to bring the House to a direct vote upon a motion to commit, if such motion shall have been made; and if this motion does not prevail, then upon amendments reported by a committee, if any; then upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question."

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will, by way of a compromise, move that the bill, without being made a special order, be postponed until next Thursday after the morning hour, and that it be printed.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. BLAINE. Can that be done by a majority vote?

The SPEAKER. It can. The Chair, however, deems it proper to state that if the motion be adopted the bill will probably not be reached this session.

Mr. BLAINE. When the bill shall be reached will not the first question be upon the motion to refer to the Judiciary Committee?

The SPEAKER. A motion to postpone to a certain day has priority of a motion to commit or amend.

Mr. BLAINE. Does it obliterate the motion to commit?

The SPEAKER. It leaves the motion to commit pending as the first question whenever the bill may be reached. A motion to postpone indefinitely comes in after a motion to commit; but a motion to postpone to a day certain has priority of a motion to commit.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Do I understand the Chair to say that, if my motion be adopted, we shall be unable to reach the bill?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the bill, if postponed, would probably not be reached during this session.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is what we want.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I renew it. On the motion there were—ayes 51, noes 75.

Mr. FINCK called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order. I submit the question whether the motion of the gentleman from Maine is in order.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Under the rules, I believe, all questions pertaining to territorial matters and to the admission of States must be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. BLAINE. And all legal questions to the Committee on the Judiciary. If the gentleman wants to divide the question I will agree that the amendments shall go the Judiciary Committee and the bill to the Territorial Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it seems by the rule the Committee on the Territories has special charge of the question before the House. He will not, however, decide the matter, but leave it to the determination of the House.

The rule concerning the Committee on the Judiciary is as follows:

"83. It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Judiciary to take into consideration such petitions and matters or things touching judicial proceedings as shall be presented, or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient."

Mr. BLAINE. That meets the point exactly. The SPEAKER. The rule concerning the Committee on the Territories is as follows:

"81. It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Territories to examine into the legislative, civil, and criminal proceedings of the Territories, and to devise and report to the House such means as in their opinion may be necessary to secure the rights and privileges of residents and non-residents."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Would it be in order to refer it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would not be, although the House can refer to whatever committee it pleases.

As the gentleman from Maine would seem to indicate by the remark he let drop that the Judiciary was the proper committee, the Chair will state that the language creating the Committee on the Judiciary seems to have been special in its character. It is provided that that committee shall take into consideration such petitions and matters or things touching judicial proceedings as shall be presented or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient. Four times in the course of the rule reference is made to judicial proceedings and judicial proceedings alone. But it is for the House to determine what committee it will refer it to.

The question was taken on Mr. BLAINE's motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and it was disagreed to.

The question next recurred on the motion to refer to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. ROSS. I move to refer it to the committee on reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. As that is a select committee, the question will first recur on referring it to the standing committee.

Mr. BUNDY moved that the House adjourn.

EXTRA COMPENSATION TO CLERKS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House, information concerning the disbursement of the fund of $250,000 and $160,000 as extra compensation to clerks in his Department; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 608) to regulate the elective franchise in the Territories of the United States; and

An act (H. R. No. 830) to fix the times for the regular meeting of Congress.

Mr. LE BLOND. I think there will be a Republican caucus in this House this evening. [Laughter.]

The motion to adjourn was agreed to, and (at ten minutes to four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of Hon. A. H. Jones, member of Congress elect, and 1,438 others, loyal people of western North Carolina, asking that the loyal people thereof be granted the privilege and power of forming a new State; or, if that is not granted, that the whole State be reorganized on a loyal basis alone.

By Mr. ALLEY: The petition of Henry K. Oliver, and 157 others, for amendment of the Constitution.

Also, the petition of Samuel Calley, and 46 others, for inquiring into the conduct of the President.

By Mr. BROOMALL: The petition of 1,249 citizens of the seventh congressional district of that State, the counties of Chester and Delaware, praying Congress to amend the internal revenue law by abolishing the tax of five per cent. on manufactures and the products of mechanical skill.

By Mr. COBB: The memorial of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin, for a change in the postal laws.

Also, the petition of citizens of Crawford county, Wisconsin, for improvement of water communications between the Mississippi valley and the Atlantic sea-board.

Also, the petition from citizens of Wiota, La Fayette county, Wisconsin, that the currency may be let alone.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of C. W. Gibson, and 36 others, citizens of Bay City, Michigan, asking Congress not to withdraw or curtail the circulation of the national currency.

Also, the petition of Hon. N. B. Bradley, O. A. Ballou, and 18 others, of the same place, praying Congress in behalf of the same object.

By Mr. CULLOM: The petition and other papers of Allen Harper, asking Congress to allow him compensation for services in the military service of the United States.

By Mr. DEMING: The petition of inhabitants of Little Rock, Arkansas, to be relieved from an unjust tax sale.

Also, the petition of cigar manufacturers of Duffield, Connecticut, to be relieved from ad valorem tax on cigars.

By Mr. DONNELLY: The petition of citizens of Minneapolis and St. Anthony, in Minnesota, that no curtailment of the national currency be made by Congress, and that the national banks be not compelled to redeem their notes in the city of New York. Also, a similar petition from citizens of Ramsey county, Minnesota, and from the Board of Trade of the city of St. Paul, in said county.

By Mr. HUNTER: The petition of John H. Boynton and John A. Brown, asking for the issue of an American register to the bark Azelia.

By Mr. KASSON: The petition of W. G. Bentley, and others, of Des Moines, Iowa, against curtailing national currency, &c.

By Mr. KETCHAM: The petition of H. Bronson, late sergeant major thirty-seventh regiment United States Army, for the equalization of bounty to soldiers who served in the war of 1812.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio: The memorial of the Leeds Manufacturing Company, of New York, in relation to the manufacture of cudbear and other coloring materials.

By Mr. LOAN: The petition of citizens of Savannah and vicinity, in Andrew county, Missouri, against the curtailment of the currency, &c.

By Mr. MORRILL: The petition of Hon. Charles Barrett, and 562 others, of Windham county, Vermont, praying for passage of tariff bill of last session with rates therein proposed on wool, or some bill with equal rates, if not higher, for the protection of the wool interest.

Also, resolutions of the Wool-Growers Association of Windham county, Vermont, asking Congress to pass speedily a tariff measure to protect the wool interest of the country.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of Obadiah Aderton, for a pension.

By Mr. PLANTS: The petition of 96 citizens of Athens county, Ohio, asking Congress to refrain from authorizing a further curtailment of the currency, or compelling the banks of the country to redeem their notes in the city of New York.

By Mr. SPALDING: The petition of E. M. Peck, R. H. Becker, and others, citizens of Ohio, on the subject of granting registers to foreign-built ships.

By Mr. TROWBRIDGE: The petition of Dr. Ira P. Bingham, and 100 others, citizens of Livingston county, Michigan, praying for an inquiry into the conduct of the President of the United States with a view to an impeachment.

By Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Morrison, Whiteside county, Illinois, asking that no act be passed curtailing the national currency, or compelling all national banks, where ever located, to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances.

By Mr. WENTWORTH: The petition of certain manufacturers of the city of Chicago, asking to be relieved from taxation.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 11, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER presented ten memorials of manufacturers of wool and constructors of burling machines, remonstrating against an extension of the letters-patent of Stephen R. Parkhurst, dated May 1, 1845, and now expired; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also presented the memorial of Robert Carter, and seventy-one others, colored citizens of New Bedford, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the admission of Nebraska as a State with a constitution which disfranchises citizens on account of color; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of loyal citizens of Arkansas, in which they ask Congress to declare the unrecognized government of Arkansas abolished and of no effect, and to confer upon the loyal persons of the State the powers of the government; and they further ask Congress to declare the twenty-six States now represented as entitled to legislate for the whole country, as it devolved upon those States to maintain the integrity of the whole country by force of arms, and also to declare, in accordance with this principle, the pending constitutional amendment ratified by a sufficient number of States, and therefore part and parcel of the Constitution. Concurring, as I do, most sincerely in the prayer of these petitioners, I hope that the committee to whom it shall be referred will take it into early consideration. It seems to me, sir, that Congress owes it to the country to bring forward or to present some practical scheme by which these sham governments in the rebel States shall be superseded. They should be treated as null and void. That is the prayer of this petition, and I hope the committee will act upon it. I move its reference to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present a memorial of citizens of Elizabeth, New Jersey, praying that that city be made a port of entry, and that an appropriation be made for the purpose of erecting a suitable building there for the accommodation of the custom-house, post office, collector and assessor of internal revenue, and for holding the Federal courts; and I will simply add that the growing importance of that city commends this memorial to the favorable consideration of the Senate. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the memorial of G. W. Harding & Co., proprietors of the Ludlow Woolen Mills, Ludlow, Vermont, and the memorial of Holmes, Whitmore & Co., manufacturers, of Springfield, Vermont, remonstrating against the extension of the letters-patent of Stephen R. Parkhurst, dated May 1, 1845, and now expired; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. MORRILL presented the memorial of A. F. Bradbury, T. R. Campbell, and Amos Abbott & Co., of Dexter, Maine, and the memorial of William Hill, president of the North Berwick Company, remonstrating against the extension of the letters-patent of Stephen R. Parkhurst, dated May 1, 1845, and now expired; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also presented the memorial of citizens of New York and owners of sea-going steamships, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 467, to amend an act entitled "An act further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, and for other purposes," approved July 25, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWE presented two petitions of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the passage of House bill, No. 718, to provide increased revenue for imports, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented four memorials of manufacturers of wool and of constructors of burring machines, remonstrating against the extension of the letters-patent of Stephen R. Parkhurst, dated May 1, 1845, and now expired; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 490) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho," approved March 3, 1863, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of C. B. Gardner, praying for compensation for brick used by the United States Army during the siege of Nashville, Tennessee, in the month of December, 1864, submitted an adverse report.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Benton Jones, praying to be reimbursed for money alleged to have been expended while acting as postmaster of the cavalry command in the department of Mississippi, reported that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of A. L. H. Cranshaw, praying for compensation for property alleged to have been destroyed and taken by the United States military authorities in Missouri while he was held a prisoner on suspicion of being a rebel spy, submitted an adverse report; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William N. Smith, of Grundy county, Missouri, praying for compensation for a tavern-house, alleged to have been burned in the town of Glasgow, Missouri, through the orders of the military officers in command there, submitted an adverse report; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Frank Pugsley, praying for pay and allowances for services rendered as a private in the Army, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 499) for the relief of Frank Pugsley, late a private in company I of the third regiment of New Hampshire volunteers. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

STEAMSHIP SCOTLAND.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of the marine underwriters of New York, praying for an appropriation for the removal of the iron steamship Scotland, wrecked on the bar outside of Sandy Hook, has directed me to report a joint resolution on that subject, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution (S. R. No. 156) to provide for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland was read three times and passed. It is a direction to the Secretary of War to cause the removal of the wreck of the iron steamship Scotland, now on the bar outside of Sandy Hook, near the entrance of New York harbor. It is proposed to appropriate $100,000 for this purpose. The Secretary of War, after notice given in one or more newspapers in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, is to receive sealed proposals for the removal of the wreck, and to make a contract for its removal with the lowest bidder, the contract price not to exceed the sum appropriated.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 500) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to amend the several acts heretofore passed to provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1865; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 501) amendatory of an act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana, approved May 26, 1864; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 502) respecting the town site of Shasta, California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CATTELL. I desire to state that I was unavoidably absent yesterday when the vote was taken on the bill to regulate the elective franchise in the Territories, and that if present I should have voted for that bill, and also for the bill regulating the time for the meeting of Congress.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 965) declaring Clinton bridge across the Mississippi river at Clinton, in the State of Iowa, a post route, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 508) to amend the organic acts of the Territories of Nebraska, Colorado, Dakota, Montana, Washington, Idaho, Arizona, Utah, and New Mexico, and had also concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 830) to fix the times for the regular meetings of Congress.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 840) for the relief of the sureties of James T. Pollock, late receiver at Crawfordsville, Indiana; and

A bill (H. R. No. 966) for the relief of Ernest F. Kleinschmidt, of Cincinnati, Ohio.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 151) appropriating money to defray the expenses of the joint select committee on retrenchment, the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 508) to regulate the elective franchise in the Territories of the United States, and the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 830) to fix the times for the regular meetings of Congress; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 965) declaring the Clinton bridge across the Mississippi river at Clinton, in the State of Iowa, a post route; the bill (H. R. No. 964) in regard to the compensation of route agents in the Post Office Department, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 229) to procure a site for a building to accommodate the post office and United States courts in New York city, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 956) to enforce the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 840) for the relief of the sureties of James T. Pollock, late receiver at Crawfordsville, Indiana, and the bill (H. R. No. 966) for the relief of Ernest F. Kleinschmidt, of Cincinnati, Ohio, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that Joseph Hill & Sons have leave to withdraw their petition and papers. It is a claim upon which there has been no report.

The motion was agreed to.

NORFOLK NAVY-YARD.

Mr. GRIMES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of temporarily closing the navy-yard at Norfolk, Virginia, and placing it, for the protection of the public property there, in charge of the commander of the Marine corps.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to inquire into the legality and expediency of a certain ordinance, now pending before the councils of the city of Washington, conceding the use of certain of the streets of said city until the year 1910 to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and one thousand extra copies of the amendment were ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF THE BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. POLAND submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That two hundred and fifty copies of House bill No. 598, with the Senate amendments thereto, be printed in bill form for the use of the Senate.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move to take up Senate bill No. 69 for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives, which is in line eleven of the House amendment, to strike out "January" and insert "October."

Mr. HOWE. I move an amendment to that, to strike out "October" and insert "July."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote was taken on that amendment and it was disagreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Very well.

The amendment of the committee to the House amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Judiciary Committee was in line twelve of the House amendment, to strike out "six" and insert "five."

Mr. HOWE. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. If it is, the effect of it is, if it has any effect, to dismiss from office in thirty days every pension agent who has been appointed since the 1st of October, 1865. But if we disagree to this amendment the clause will only remove those who have been appointed since the 1st of October, 1866, and I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment of the committee. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senate will only listen to the effect of the amendment asked for here by the committee it seems to me they will disagree to it. If we agree to that amendment, as I said before, we throw out of office every agent who has been appointed since the 1st of October, 1865. If we do not agree to it nobody will be displaced except those who have been appointed since the 1st of October, 1866.

Mr. SUMNER. That does not go back far enough.

Mr. HOWE. I think it does go back far enough.

Mr. SUMNER. The month of August was a very destructive month. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. It is a curious fact, Mr. President, that, however destructive the month of August may have been to other officers, it is not known to have struck down any pension agent. I cannot hear of one in the United States. It is a remarkable fact, but I think we ought to give due credit to it and be grateful for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have heard no argument yet that satisfies me that this amendment or any such amendment ought to be adopted. I understand that the object is to remove from office certain persons who have been appointed, so as to make the offices vacant and put it in the hands of the President to make new appointments. I suppose that these appointments which have heretofore been made are regarded as objectionable, and for that reason it is thought to be advisable to remove them. But what assurance have we that the new appointments will be any better than those that have already been made? Is there any particular necessity for this amendment? Will any advantage be gained to anybody by its adoption? I have no doubt that the appointments heretofore made, many of them, are exceptional; and if the Senate had any remedy it would be well enough to apply that remedy; but if they are removed I suppose, if not the same men, similar men will be appointed by the President and their appointments must be confirmed by the Senate or there will be no persons to discharge the duties of these offices. I should like to know what is to be gained by this proposed amendment.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I have but very little knowledge of this bill, and therefore, although I have called it up frequently, I have not attempted to say anything in relation to it. The bill was originally passed by the Senate at the last session, and the purpose of it was to give the appointment of these officers to the President of the United States, subject to confirmation by the Senate. They have been heretofore and are now appointed by the Secretary of the Interior; and while the office was of little importance it was perhaps well enough that the incumbents should be appointed in that way, but these offices have become now of great importance. These men have the distribution of large amounts of money, and their offices are very important. After its passage by the Senate this bill was taken up in the other House and amended, as Senators will see by examining the print before them; and I apprehend that unless we agree to the House amendment in some form, the bill may not pass and become a law. Therefore, although so far as I am concerned personally I have little care about this amendment, I think it better that it should be adopted substantially as it came from the committee, and I hope that it will be done and that we may be able to dispose of the bill at the present time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the amendment which is now before the Senate should be adopted, would it then be in order to move to strike out all of the proviso in the House amendment and substitute other words?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion would be in order, but the Chair is advised that there is already an amendment to the proviso proposed by the committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to strike out all after the words "provided further" in line nine of the House amendment to the close of that amendment, and to insert other words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion in the opinion of the Chair will clearly be in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But it is not in order now, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not while another amendment is pending. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the committee to strike out "six" in line twelve and insert "five," and upon this amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yea 1, nays 30; as follows:

YEA—Mr. Chandler—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Patterson, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Williams—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomroy, Riddle, Ross, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Judiciary Committee was to strike out of the House amendment the following words:

And that the President shall, within fifteen days from the passage of this act, nominate to the Senate persons for pension agents in the several agencies in which pension agents have been appointed since the said 1st day of January, A. D. 1865; and that all pension agents appointed prior to said date last named, and now acting, shall continue in their respective offices until their successors shall be nominated and confirmed in accordance with the provisions of this act.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And of all other pension agents when successors shall be duly appointed in their places.

So as to make the House amendment read:

That the number of pension agencies in any State or Territory shall in no case be increased hereafter so as to exceed three, and that no such agency shall be established in addition to those now existing, in any State or Territory in which the whole amount of pensions paid during the fiscal year next preceding shall not have exceeded the sum of $500,000: And provided further, That the term of office of all pension agents appointed since the 1st day of October, A. D. 1866, shall expire at the end of thirty days from the passage of this act, and of all other pension agents when successors shall be duly appointed in their places.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives as amended.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the House amendment by striking out the whole proviso after the word "further" in the ninth line to the end of the twenty-third line, and in lieu of those words inserting:

That the term of office of all pension agents now in office shall expire when successors shall be duly appointed.

As the section now stands Congress will legislate out of office pension agents who have been appointed since the 1st day of last October and leave all other pension agents to go out of office when their successors shall be duly appointed. I do not think the Senate of the United States would want to occupy that position, legislating with reference to a few office-holders in one way, and to another set of office-holders of the same class, appointed by virtue of the same authority, holding their offices under the same law, in another mode. I do not know of any instance in which Congress have legislated the incumbents out of office where they have changed the office so as to make it subject to presidential instead of a departmental appointment, but have left them to go out of office as all other officers do when successors are properly appointed. Now, why not do that in regard to this set of officers? I propose here that hereafter pension agents shall be appointed by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate, and that the present incumbents shall go out when successors are thus appointed. I think that would be decent legislation on the part of Congress; but to select a few men and legislate them out and legislate others in is not becoming this body, as I think.

Mr. LANE. By the bill as the Senate passed it at the last session it was provided that all pension agents should be hereafter appointed by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate. The amendment of the House, as now amended, is, that the term of office of all pension agents appointed since the 1st of October, 1866, shall expire within thirty days after the passage of the bill, and it shall be the duty of the President to send in others; and all pension agents appointed prior to that time hold their offices at the pleasure of the President subject to be removed, and their offices expire whenever he shall nominate successors who shall be confirmed by the Senate. My object in voting for this amendment of the House is simply to limit the term of office of those who have been appointed since the 1st of October, 1866, and who have displaced Republicans appointed under a Republican Administration, honest, faithful, and competent men, without any charge having been made against them, but simply for political considerations. I give this vote knowingly and most willingly with a view to limit the term of office of all those who have received appointments since the 1st of October, 1866, and I hope my colleague's amendment will not prevail. I vote with that express object to legislate out of office those gentlemen who have been appointed to supply the places of others from mere political considerations.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to know whether this amendment if agreed to strikes out the amendment of the committee at the end of the section which has already been adopted. I understand the object to be to get rid of the whole of the section commencing with the word "and" in the ninth line. What I want to call attention to is the provision which the Senate has agreed to as reported from the committee that these officers shall hold their offices until their successors are duly appointed. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are establishing these offices during the pleasure of both the President and the Senate. We may be creating what may be equivalent to life officers, or very nearly that, instead of following the policy which has prevailed to a great extent in recent legislation of limiting terms of office, giving them some fixed duration. I think it is hardly worth while for the purpose of disturbing a few officers, if there are indeed any who have been appointed since the 1st of October, to intrude this principle into our legislation.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Senator from Pennsylvania will find, if he will read the text of the original bill, that these officers are to be appointed for four years.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 6, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Patterson, and Saulsbury—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Williams—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cattell, Cowan, Cresswell, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fogg, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—23.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. The bill under consideration is very good as far as it goes. It is only applicable to pension agents. I see no reason why we should not apply the same principle to other officers. I called attention to this point the other day and gave notice of an amendment which at a proper time I should move. It seems to me indeed that the abuse, if I may so express myself, has been, if possible, greater with regard to other officers than it has been even with regard to pension agents; but without pretending to say whether it has been greater or less, we must all be resolved that there has been an abuse. We know perfectly well that when the President returned from his eccentric journey to the West this last autumn, he signaled his arrival in Washington by an attempt to carry out what he had promised to do in one of his speeches; in other words, to "kick" Republicans "out" of office. Now, it seems to me that Congress owes this duty to the country to protect these men so far as it can. Now if we take to ourselves the power which under the Constitution is given to us with regard to officers of requiring that they shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, we shall do something in the way of throwing a shield over the citizens who formerly held office, and who, in pursuance of the promise of the President at St. Louis, have been "kicked out." I use language which certainly I should not employ as my own. I use it in quotation marks; it is the language of the President of the United States. To meet that class of cases I send to the Chair an amendment which I desire to have come in at the end.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. SUMNER, which was to add to the House amendment as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That all other agents or officers appointed by the President or by the head of any Department whose salary or compensation derived from fees or otherwise exceeds $1,000 annually, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the term of office of all such officers appointed since the 1st day of July, 1866, shall expire at the end of thirty days from the passage of this act: Provided, That this is not applicable to clerks of the Departments.

Mr. HOWE. I only rise to inquire if that is an amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Massachusetts to move it so.

Mr. MORRILL. It occurs to me now that my colleague [Mr. FESSENDEN] expressed an interest in this measure when it was up the other day, and having sent to him I learn that he is engaged in the Supreme Court room. I suggest this fact and should be very glad if the Senator who has charge of it would allow this matter to pass over informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is at fault in not calling up the unfinished business of yesterday, the morning hour having expired. The business properly before the Senate is the bill (S. No. 453) regulating the tenure of offices.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 822) for the relief of Timothy Leyden;

A bill (H. R. No. 823) for the relief of John A. Dawson, of Mount Sterling, Kentucky;

A bill (H. R. No. 824) for the relief of Edward Blanchard; and

A bill (H. R. No. 825) for the relief of Henry Rudd, of Henry county, Iowa.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses, namely:

RULE —. There shall be a Joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to consist of five members on the part of the Senate and seven on the part of the House, whose duty it shall be to consider all subjects relating to the public edifices and grounds within the city of Washington which may be referred to them and report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relating thereto as may seem to them expedient.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 822) for the relief of Timothy Leyden;

A bill (H. R. No. 823) for the relief of John A. Dawson, of Mount Sterling, Kentucky;

A bill (H. R. No. 824) for the relief of Edward Blanchard; and

A bill (H. R. No. 825) for the relief of Henry Rudd, of Henry county, Iowa.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 453) to regulate the tenure of offices, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HOWARD to the amendment reported by the joint committee on retrenchment. The amendment to the amendment was in section two, line eleven, after the word "Senate" to insert the following:

And shall require of such person bond with sufficient surety or sureties for the faithful discharge of his official duties under such temporary appointment, if such bond be required by law of the person suspended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to my friend from Michigan a little modification of that, not only to cover the bond, but the test oath that is required, and to avoid the use of the word "appointment," inasmuch as we do not by the bill treat these temporary designations as appointments. I would, therefore, with the approval of my friend from Michigan, if he shall approve it when he hears it, suggest as a substitute for his amendment the insertion of these words in the very same place:

And such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the person duly appointed to fill such office.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With that modification I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Michigan as accepting the proposed amendment of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the power of the Senator from Michigan to adopt it as part of his own amendment, and the question then is on the amendment, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move further to amend the amendment reported by the committee by adding to it the sections which I send to the Chair. They have been prepared in accordance with the suggestions made by gentlemen interested in the bill yesterday afternoon, which it appeared to the committee would have been better in another bill; but yielding with pleasure to those suggestions, we have prepared these sections with a view to cover the points which were referred to yesterday.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment to the amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, accept any appointment to or employment in any office, or shall hold or exercise, or attempt to hold or exercise any such office or employment, he shall be deemed and is hereby declared to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and he shall be punished therefor by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

And be it further enacted, That every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed and are hereby declared to be high misdemeanors, and every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate, at the close of each session thereof to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury and to each of his Assistants and to each of the Auditors and to each of the Comptrollers in the Treasury, and to the Treasurer, and to the Register of the Treasury, a full and complete list, duly certified, of all persons who shall have been nominated to and rejected by the Senate during such session, and a like list of all the offices to which nominations shall have been made and not confirmed and filled at such session.

And be it further enacted, That whenever the President shall, without the advice and consent of the Senate, designate, authorize, or employ any person to perform the duties of any office he shall forthwith notify the Secretary of the Treasury thereof, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury thereupon to communicate such notice to all the proper accounting and disbursing officers of his Department.

And be it further enacted, That no money shall be paid or received from the Treasury, or paid or received from or retained out of any public moneys or funds of the United States, whether in the Treasury or not, to or by or for the benefit of any person appointed to or authorized to act in or holding or exercising the duties or functions of any office contrary to the provisions of this act: nor shall any claim, account, voucher, order, certificate, warrant, or other instrument providing for or relating to such payment, receipt, or retention be presented, passed, allowed, approved, certified, or paid by any officer of the United States or by any person exercising the functions or performing the duties of any office or place of trust under the United States or in respect to such office or the exercising or performing the functions or duties thereof; and every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be punished therefor by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding ten years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the honorable member who proposes the amendment had better follow what I believe has been the precedent in all such cases, and provide that the punishment shall be inflicted upon trial and conviction of the offense. As it stands, the case is submitted to the court apparently, and the court can award the punishment. The result, of course, would be the same; they would be obliged to try him by a jury under the Constitution of the United States; but it might be held to give the power to the court itself. I think the Senator will find upon looking at the penal statutes that they always say that upon trial and conviction the punishment shall be inflicted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I omitted these words in drawing up this section in order to save what appeared to me to be a useless superfluity; because I supposed in the framing of a penal statute that if you, in the first place, defined an offense, and then declared what the punishment of the offense should be, the general principles of law operating upon the administration of the affairs of justice would require that before anybody could subject the offender to punishment it must be judicially ascertained that the crime had been committed, and that he was the party who had committed the crime. If there should be any doubt in the minds of Senators upon that subject, as certainly there was not in my mind, although I agree it is usual to insert such words, but not universal, I should have no objection to their being inserted. I shall not resist a motion to amend by putting them in.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend it in that way. It is better to follow the precedents.

Some court may think they have a right to try without a jury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the power of the Senator from Vermont to accept that amendment and make it a part of his own; but this is an amendment to an amendment, in the second degree, and is not susceptible of further amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that he had better amend his proposition in that way by inserting the words "upon trial and conviction thereof;" so as to read "guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on trial and conviction thereof, he shall be punished," &c., in the first, second, and last sections of his amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Maryland out of respect to his opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to what he may not think of much importance; it is the penalty. I observe that there is a maximum penalty fixed, but not a minimum penalty. Now I will ask the Senator, upon the whole, considering the whole subject, whether it would not be advisable to have a minimum penalty. I can imagine, and I think the Senator can, a judge who, taking advantage of the language, might, for instance, inflict a fine of one dollar, five dollars, or something that would be trivial. I would suggest to him, therefore, to guard against that by fixing a minimum penalty; say $500 or $1,000. It seems to me that any person who can be convicted under a statute of such importance ought not to escape with a small penalty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has been general, although not universal, in the enactment of penal laws to fix the maximum of punishment and not to fix the minimum, leaving it to the sound discretion of the tribunal before whom the offender may be convicted to decide how small, down to merely a nominal punishment, the penalty which the law should visit upon the offense should be; and that, in my opinion, is the true principle as a general rule upon which penal legislation ought to proceed. Therefore, I did not think it advisable, and I think my friend from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who was very usefully instrumental in the drawing up of these additional sections, will agree with me in thinking that it would not be wise in this instance more than in any other, for the present at least, until we shall find that the courts abuse the discretion which we leave to them, to fix any minimum to the punishment. The provisions of the sections now extend to every officer in the Treasury Department who can by any reasonable possibility have any connection or agency, no matter how small, in paying out money illegally to these persons, or in passing any account or voucher, or giving them a commission, or doing anything in the chain of transactions which shall result, or may result in getting the public money into the hands of persons who may not be entitled to receive it. Now, cases may happen, and they do unfortunately generally happen, where if anybody is to be prosecuted it is some minor offender. He who, if there should be any violation of this law, is most likely to be the chief offender, whether a President or a Secretary, or whoever violates it; and I do not mean by this to intimate that either of those gentlemen would wish to violate it; but whoever the chief offender in such a matter is, generally is not the person who is prosecuted; but the law seizes upon some easy victim; and it is almost always the case. Now, I think, just as we all think in general on such subjects, that there ought to be a discretion in the court before whom the offender shall be tried and convicted to take into consideration the extenuating circumstances of his offense, the humbleness of his position, the temptation to which he was exposed, and all those circumstances which in the wise administration of criminal justice enter into and compose a part of the consideration which imposes the penalty, and to leave it thus to the judge to say down to the nominal point how much the penalty should be. That is my opinion.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall make no motion on the question; but as I am going to defer entirely to the Senator from Vermont, I should like to have his attention merely for the minute or two in which I shall reply. I am not aware that the usage of the statutes is as uniform as the Senator represents. Indeed, I think he will find that in all the earlier legislation there was a maximum and a minimum penalty. I think the disposition latterly has been to have only a maximum penalty.

However, without going into that question, looking at it simply as a question of reason and expediency, I have only now to ask you to consider whether, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, there may not be special reasons for a minimum penalty. You wish a statute that shall really be stringent, that as you read it shall seem to carry its penalties through, right to the mark. Do you do so if you have simply the maximum penalty? The answer is obvious, that a judge, if so disposed, may absolutely or almost nullify your statute. He may hear the trial, listen to the verdict of guilty, and then let the offender go. Now shall it be, sir? Shall we not in this case, where political temptation may intrude on the bench, make a provision that shall at least secure a certain degree of punishment.

That is what I have to say in reply to my friend from Vermont. If it does not impress him as it does me, I shall leave him to follow his own judgment; I shall not interfere with his bill by a motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend is mistaken, as he rarely is, respecting the state of the penalties in the early statutes. The first penal statute that was ever passed by the Government of the United States of America, or about the first one, the act of 1790, the general criminal code of the United States, does not provide, so far as I observe, holding it in my hand, by a rapid examination, any minimum penalties at all, except it may be for the punishment of treason, which is death, which is both the maximum and minimum at the same time; and then the second section for misprision of treason punishes the party by imprisonment not exceeding seven years and a fine not exceeding $1,000, and so on. The observations which the Senator from Massachusetts has submitted to us are undoubtedly entitled to great weight as applied to the circumstances that now exist, and to respect; but let me tell him that the difficulty is, when you are passing a penal statute, or any other statute which requires the judicial departments of the Government to enforce it or to punish violations of it, if in framing that statute you act upon the theory of distrust of the judicial tribunal that is to vindicate it, you may just as well not pass the statute at all, because if you have a judge before whom any offender against this act is to be tried who is so swayed by political bias or any other improper motive as to induce him to mitigate the punishment below what in justice it ought to be, he never will suffer a conviction at all. I need not tell my learned friend from Massachusetts, who is familiar with the courts of that Commonwealth, as pure and as able as any in the country, how easy it is for a judge, without exposing himself to the least degree of suspicion, to overthrow a criminal prosecution. Nothing is easier in the world. Therefore, we cannot have any safety in the administration of this law if we go upon the theory that we cannot trust the courts to punish the infraction of it. If we cannot, we may as well not pass it, except as vindicating ourselves and providing such further means as, if this passes, we shall be provided with for asserting the majesty of the law in another way against any person who offends against it, where some other than the ordinary judicial tribunals of the country will be the grand tribunal before whom the trial and conviction, if conviction ought to follow, will be had.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I assisted in the preparation of these amendments, and I concur in the views expressed by the Senator from Vermont, for the reason, in the first place, that this is a new offense created by statute, and it does not define a crime involving moral turpitude, but rather a political offense; and there is some ground to suppose that mistakes may be made under this law by persons in office, and I think that in such cases there should be a large discretion left to the court. As was suggested by the Senator from Vermont, this law applies as well to subordinates as to the principals who may be concerned in administering the law, and if a prosecution should be directed against a subordinate instead of the principal, as it may be, then I think the court should have a discretion to proportion the punishment to the circumstances of the accused.

But I will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that where a person is tried and convicted under this law, he is not only to be fined or imprisoned, or punished in both ways, but certain disqualifications follow the conviction. Whenever a person is convicted under this law, he is convicted of a felony, and according to the law of this country whenever a man is convicted of a felony, he becomes disqualified to hold any office at any future time; and that of itself I should regard as a very great punishment to any man who might be, while engaged in the discharge of the duties of his office, prosecuted and convicted of malfeasance and condemned to the punishment which the law directs—a penalty which is followed by a disqualification to hold any office, and in many of the States he is also disfranchised upon such a conviction. I think there is no danger to apprehend that this law has not sufficient terror in it to prevent its violation.

Mr. HOWARD. I concur fully in the view taken of this amendment by the Senator from Massachusetts. It seems to me clear enough that under a strict construction of this amendment a court would not be departing from its duty, its strict, legal duty, if it should refuse to inflict any punishment at all upon the offender after he had been formally tried and convicted, because the amendment declares that he shall not be punished by fine exceeding a certain amount, without fixing any minimum, and shall not be punished by imprisonment beyond a certain number of years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator misunderstands the language. It does not say he "shall not be punished by fine exceeding," but it says he shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well. How then is the court to affix any penalty at all? The court is not bound to impose one cent of fine or one hour of imprisonment, is it? Suppose a court should omit to sentence the offender at all, would the court be violating its duty under this act?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. I confess, Mr. President, I do not see it exactly in that light. It strikes me as being an anomalous mode of criminal legislation. There certainly ought to be some certain penalty fixed and established in the statute, so that the offender shall know to a certainty when he commits the offense that he is to be punished to some extent—at least that he is not to go scot free, or go with a mere nominal punishment; that the business of legislation here has in view his actual punishment for the purpose of deterring him and others in like case offending for the future.

Beside all that, Mr. President, it seems to me to be throwing upon the courts of justice a very irksome and in many cases a very painful duty to measure out at their own discretion, without reference to the statute and the will of the Legislature that has expressed no opinion at all, the punishment which is to be inflicted.

I throw out these suggestions to the gentleman from Vermont in the hope that he will make an amendment of his present amendment so as to fix a minimum to the penalties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the proposed amendment?

Mr. HOWARD. I cannot agree to that amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire what the precise amendment is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont is to add several additional sections to the substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Senator from Michigan to make a motion.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state for the information of the Senate that the pending question now is on these additional penal sections, which were submitted by me in accordance with the wish expressed yesterday afternoon.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Connors, Cragin, Oreswell, Edmunds, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Willey, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ross, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment reported by the committee as amended by the Senate.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I had prepared an amendment yesterday to come in at the same place as the one offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] That amendment was withdrawn, but perhaps with the intention of offering it again.

Mr. SHERMAN. You had better offer yours.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. My amendment meets the object of the Senator from Ohio, and has some further provisions. It is in section one, line ten, after the word "office" to insert:

For a term of four years from the date of his appointment, unless a different term or tenure is prescribed by the Constitution or by law, and in any case.

So that the section, if amended, will read:

That every person (excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General) holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office for a term of four years from the date of his appointment, unless a different term or tenure is prescribed by the Constitution or by law, and in any case until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided.

The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be this: that the terms of all offices that now have not a fixed term will be made four years. Of course there is nothing in it to prevent a different term being fixed by law for any offices hereinafter created. Another effect will be that every officer will come up for appointment or reappointment at least once in a presidential term, and of course will also come before the Senate for confirmation or reconfirmation at least once in a presidential term. I think this is perfectly fair on both sides as between the Senate and the President, and therefore it ought to be adopted. It also provides or retains what I believe is the provision intended by the committee, that all officers, whether their terms are fixed under this amendment or whether they have been previously fixed by law or the Constitution, except those that are excepted in the body of the committee's amendment, shall hold their offices until their successors are appointed—that has become a very usual provision in our State and municipal laws and constitutions—so that there shall never be an interregnum in the office unless occasioned by death or something of that kind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know, speaking personally and for myself, that I have any objection to so much of the amendment as proposes that all officers who are not now four-year men shall be such; but I think the effect of the amendment of the Senator introduced in the place where he proposes to introduce it would be a little greater than what he seems to suppose himself. I think the effect would be, first, to continue from this date for four years the holding of any office by any person whose time may be almost out already. I only heard it read once, and I may be mistaken about that, but I fear from the collocation of the words in the original amendment that that would be the effect.

Then I think another effect would be to preclude the President and the Senate, acting together and in harmony, from removing any such officer until the four years were expired. That was a provision which the committee had under consideration. But they thought it wiser for the present, at least, to leave the right of removal, which now by law is vested in the President at any time within the four years, to be still exercised by the President and the Senate in conjunction at any time during the session. The effect of the amendment would be to fix the duration of every office for the term of four years, and it makes no provision for any interference by the President and the Senate together, no matter how urgent may be the motives which would lead them to act if they had the power, while the bill, as it stands as reported by the committee, merely declares that these officers named shall be entitled to hold their office until a successor shall have been in like manner, that is, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, duly appointed; and then it provides at the end that this shall not be construed to extend the term of any office. I would suggest to my friend from West Virginia whether he intends to have his amendment produce such results as I have named.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Certainly not. I am not sure that I understood the Senator distinctly as to his first objection; but the effect of this amendment will certainly be to make all terms that are not now fixed by law or the Constitution last for four years. That is in accordance, I believe, with the precedents in the cases of more than one class of officers. Most offices are for four years; but assessors and collectors of internal revenue have no fixed terms; and I think the amendment is important in that respect, that there ought to be a period of time fixed for the term of that class of officers at least. I do not think it interferes at all with the right of removal, or at least I acted under the supposition that that was otherwise provided for in the bill. Removals are only to take place for cause. This amendment certainly does not interfere with that. The last section, or a portion of it, may perhaps be dispensed with if this amendment be adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot vote for this amendment, but it is only because I think the policy which it inaugurates is altogether wrong. I do not know that any statute ever passed has created more trouble and done more mischief than that fixing a short term of office for these several appointees. The whole country is agitated in advance of the termination of the office; the President, or those who have the power to confer office are called upon; and frequently the pressure is so great that they are unable to resist, and new officers are put into the Departments. The result—I think I speak from knowledge—is that the business of the Government is not half as well managed as it was before this system was introduced. It is only for that reason that I shall vote against the amendment. I concur with my friend from West Virginia that it will not at all interfere with the authority of the President and Senate to remove officers. Offices may be continued under the provision which he seeks to incorporate into the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the amendment will not be adopted, because it is difficult to tell without close examination what effect it will have upon the other provisions of the bill. This bill was carefully considered in committee, and one portion of the bill was adapted to the other portions so as to make it a harmonious system; and this proposed amendment may derange the whole system which this bill proposes to establish. Now, there is no difficulty when an office is created, if desirable, in fixing the term of the office, and it may be desirable to do so. It is impossible now to comprehend at one glance all the offices of the United States; but it may be desirable to have the term of one office longer than the term of another. The Senator, however, proposes to make a sort of Procrustean couch here and put every officer in the United States upon it, and to make the duration of every office four years. Before that amendment is adopted it is desirable to reflect upon the subject, to think of the different offices in the United States, and determine that there is no reason why one officer should continue longer in office than another. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont is made upon good ground; it at any rate involves the subject in doubt, if it is not altogether clear that this amendment will continue those who are now in office in their present positions for four years from the passage of this bill. I think it is susceptible of that construction. Probably that is not the intention of the Senator who proposes the amendment, but that may be the construction put upon it; and it presents a question of doubt; it opens a door for controversy as to the construction of this law. For these reasons I hope it will not be incorporated into this bill. It may be desirable in some other statute to make a provision like this, and if the subject was well and thoroughly considered it might appropriately be attached to an appropriation bill or some other bill, so as to fix the tenure of all the offices in the United States; but I am apprehensive that it would lead to trouble if incorporated into the first section of this bill. I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I cannot think that the amendment I have proposed is liable to the objection made by the Senator from Oregon. There is nothing in it, certainly, which would prevent Congress passing a law to-morrow as to any class of officers whatever, limiting the term to two years or any other time. It certainly, then, cannot be objectionable on that account. It merely fixes a term for those officers for whom no other term is fixed, and I suppose if an office should be hereafter created, and no term fixed, this amendment would apply. If I am not mistaken, I have made it four years from the date of appointment; and, as I have already said, every officer must thus come in review before the Senate at least once during a presidential term; and on the other hand, the President, during his term, will have the right, by the expiration of the term, of reappointing every officer or appointing some one else in his place. It seems to me it is just and fair; and looking to the future it is, as a permanent arrangement, one that would work very happily. But I am not at all tenacious about it. It was suggested more than a year or two ago in respect to the officers I have named, that assessors and collectors of the revenue should be limited in their terms. That would bring many who have now been appointed for more than three years before the Senate in turn, whereas they will not come here otherwise.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I feel it to be my duty to propose an amendment to this bill, though I have no thought that it will be adopted. I move to strike out of the third section all after the word "thereafter" in the sixth line, to the close of the section. I do it upon two grounds—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the amendment of the committee having been agreed to, and that being a substitute for the entire bill, the motion of the Senator is not now in order. It will be in order in the Senate. The section having been agreed to in committee, it cannot be amended as the Senator proposes. The amendment will be in order when the bill shall have been reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the question was stated to be on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Must I offer my amendment now before the amendment is concurred in?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be moved as an amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I move to strike out all of the third section after the word "thereafter" in the sixth line. The words which I move to strike out are:

And if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to such office so vacant or temporarily filled as aforesaid, during such next session of the Senate, such office shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto until the same shall be filled by appointment thereto, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and during such time all the powers and duties belonging to such office shall be exercised by such other officer as may by law exercise such powers and duties in case of a vacancy in such office.

I move to strike this part of the section from it, because in the first place I think it is in violation of the Constitution as the Constitution has been uniformly construed. The Constitution provides that—"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

This will depend altogether upon the construction which shall be given to the words "happen during the recess of the Senate." Many have thought that that language means such a vacancy as takes place or begins during the recess; but the construction has obtained, and I suppose it is as settled as any construction well can be, that the words mean vacancies that may exist or be during the recess of the Senate. The Government has been carried on upon that construction. Where a vacancy exists during the session of the Senate, and is not filled before the adjournment, it has been understood and construed as a vacancy happening during the recess, and the President has uniformly filled such vacancies. If this be the proper construction of the Constitution, then there is no power to pass the section as it now stands.

But, sir, suppose that the Constitution does not forbid the legislation which is proposed; is it good policy to adopt it? Here is a period perhaps of some months during which the Senate may not be in session. The appointee of the President may not be agreeable to the Senate for that time; yet that appointee can only hold the office until the close of the next session; it is but a temporary appointment; and no great harm can take place or be suffered because a person holds office whose political views are not agreeable to the Senate for that length of time. What may be the consequences of the adoption of this section it is difficult for us to tell. The office is to remain in abeyance; it is not to be filled in the case which is stated in the section, the case being where an appointment is not made during the session by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. From the time of the adjournment of the Senate the office is to be in abeyance; and to get away from the practical difficulties the section provides that—

During such time all the powers and duties belonging to such office shall be exercised by such other officer as may by law exercise such powers and duties in case of a vacancy in such office.

I do not know in how many cases that provision would be applicable. Take the case of a collector of internal revenue; suppose the Senate and the President fail to agree upon an appointee for that office, and an adjournment of the Senate takes place, the office becomes vacant; who then is to exercise the powers and discharge the duties of that office? I do not know. The important collections ought to be made in the month of June; but that office being vacant during the summer, who shall exercise the powers and discharge the duties? The Secretary of the Treasury cannot do it, nor can he appoint anybody to discharge those duties. This section is framed as if in case of a vacancy in any office there is always provided by law somebody who may discharge the duties of the position; but I think in point of law that is not the case. It would be a very serious matter if in some of the districts the revenues, for instance, should not be collected.

The question is a very plain one. I need not discuss it further. If I am right that the Constitution does not allow this legislation, that is an end of debate on the subject. If I am wrong on that, I think the other considerations I have stated ought to govern the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator from Indiana moves to strike out the latter clause of section three for the reason, as he alleges, that it is not in accordance with the Constitution. During a former Congress I had occasion to give this subject some attention as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary; it was at a time when there was no such political agitation as disturbs the minds and the judgments of some men now. That committee was instructed by this body to inquire into the power of the President to make just such appointments as are contemplated by the clause to which the gentleman's motion refers, and they came to the conclusion, and I think very properly and correctly, that the President has no such power under the Constitution.

The Constitution declares that the power of appointment shall be lodged in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No appointment, therefore, to an office can, properly and legally speaking, be made without the concurrence of these two branches of the Government. The President, who consults the Senate as to the propriety of a contemplated appointment, does so in the shape of a nomination, and the assent of the Senate is given to that nomination to make it effective. Without these preliminary steps it is impossible under our Constitution that a legal appointment to an office can be made. I think the honorable Senator from Indiana will not dispute this proposition. It may be wrong; it may have been possibly unwise in our fathers who framed and ratified the Constitution to insert such a clause in the instrument. That, however, is not now the question. The question is as to what they actually intended by the language they used. It is, in other words, a question of power, authority, jurisdiction.

The clause in the Constitution to which I refer proceeds further to declare that the President may fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, not by making appointments, but by issuing commissions which shall expire at the termination of the next session of the Senate. I agree with him that the practical precedents of the Government thus far lead to this interpretation of the Constitution, that it is competent for the President during the recess of the Senate to turn out of office a present incumbent and to fill his place by commissioning another. This has been, I admit, the practice for long years and many generations; but it is to be observed at the same time that this claim of power on the part of the Executive has been uniformly contested by some of the best minds of the country.

What is it, sir, to fill up a vacancy? The President and the Senate make the officer—give him his appointment. It is very true that the last act is to be performed by the President, which is the issuing to the officer of a commission. Now, is it in accordance with the language used in the Constitution that one branch of the appointing power may create a vacancy? Is it according to the just and fair usage of language to say that the agent making the appointment may remove the incumbent and thus create the vacancy which by the terms of the Constitution is to "happen?" I think not. I think it is a misuse of language. The language itself is "vacancies that may happen," plainly, indubitably, according to the ordinary use of language, implying contingency, chance, uncertainty; at all events excluding the agency of the person who bestows the appointment to the office. I suppose that when the framers of the Constitution used this language they used it in reference to the common law of England; and how by that law does a vacancy in an office "happen;" in other words, take place, come into existence? It happens, as we all know, by resignation, by death, by absolute inability to discharge the functions of the office; but it never is spoken of as happening in consequence of a removal from office by the executive power.

Then, according to the view I take of the Constitution, the first clause of the third section of this bill is simply a restatement in more full and accurate language of the real intention of the Constitution itself. It declares—

That the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by reason of death, resignation, expiration of term of office, or other lawful cause, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session thereafter.

And I believe that such is the full extent under the Constitution, according to its true and most natural interpretation, of the power of the President over vacancies; and if that be the true interpretation it follows logically that where the vacancy has not been filled during the session of the Senate at which it should have been filled, during the whole of the succeeding recess of the Senate that office must necessarily remain in abeyance; in other words, vacant, without an incumbent. It is really a mere reenactment of the true sense of the clause. I cannot vote to strike out this clause of the third section, because I think it very necessary it should be retained in order to remove all doubt.

I have said, sir, that it is not in the power of the President to create such a vacancy by the appointment of a successor. The right of the Senate and the duty of the Senate is plain. An appointment proper cannot be made without consulting them and obtaining their consent. The country looks to them for their advice, for their opinion, for their interference, in order to secure suitable qualifications and to restrain the wayward exercise of this assumed power by the Executive whenever such a case shall exist; and it is beyond doubt that during the last year this power of removal has been exercised most wantonly and most injuriously in multitudes of cases, and greatly to the detriment of the true interest of the country. And the cases are almost innumerable in which the names of persons have been sent to us and put in nomination for offices, and those nominations rejected, and still after the adjournment of the Senate the President, in utter contempt of the opinions of the Senate, has proceeded to issue temporary commissions to persons thus rejected.

Sir, I believe there is no member of this body who will rise in his place and declare that under the Constitution it is competent for the President after the rejection of such a nomination, and during the succeeding recess of the Senate, to issue to that person a temporary commission; and why? Because it is too plain to every mind that in reference to the particular individual the Senate having passed an unfavorable judgment, it was virtually forbidden that person to hold the office, and such a temporary appointment by the President is a complete contempt of the opinion of the Senate expressed in constitutional form.

Now, sir, I believe Congress have full power over this subject, and that it is our duty now (although this perhaps is not the fittest time at which to settle the question) to enact some statute which for the future shall restrain this wanton exercise of the power claimed by the President, and which in my judgment is forbidden by the Constitution. It is time for us to come up to our work and to do our duty to the country. The country expects it and will not be content if we leave our seats at the present session without passing some such law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Michigan has discussed two questions which are not involved in the proposition that I have submitted to the Senate. The first is the power of the President to create a vacancy during the recess of the Senate by the removal of an incumbent from an office; the second is the power of the President to appoint after the adjournment of the Senate a party to an office who had previously been rejected by the Senate. The question which is submitted to the Senate by my amendment is this: whether in the case of a vacancy in an office existing at the time of the adjournment of the Senate the President has a right for the purpose of executing the laws to fill that office under the clause of the Constitution to which I have called attention. That particular question the Senator has not much discussed. He has referred to the report which, as the representative of the Judiciary Committee, he submitted to the Senate during the Thirty-Seventh Congress. Now, I wish to ask of the Senator from Michigan what is his answer to a case made by the Secretary of State in a correspondence which accompanies that report of the learned Senator. Suppose, during the last days of the session of a Congress, an office is created and there is no time before the adjournment to fill that office by an appointment and confirmation, is that office under the Constitution to remain vacant until Congress shall again assemble, or may the President appoint under his power to fill vacancies happening during the recess? I will read from the letter to which I refer of Secretary Seward, dated January 12, 1863, addressed to the distinguished Senator as the representative on that occasion of the Committee on the Judiciary:

"In regard to some of these appointments, the offices were newly created by Congress, and required special qualifications to fill them. There was not time enough for the proper consideration of the subject before the adjournment of the Senate. As to others, the compensation was in the shape of fees only, which inducement was not such as to invite application for the offices. They were consequently filled as soon as proper persons could be found to accept them. This course has been adopted in all cases when the public interest seemed to require it. In regard to the constitutionality of this course I would respectfully refer you to the Opinions of the Attorney General, volume vii, page 223."

The law officer of the Government seems to have given the opinion that the President during the recess had the power, and it was his duty, to fill such vacancies; and, long before the political controversies that now agitate the country had sprung up, the Secretary of State during the administration of Mr. Lincoln recommended the appointment of many men to office when the vacancies which they were to fill had existed at the time of the adjournment of the Senate, and he stated as a necessity for such appointments that Congress had created the offices so near the adjournment that it became impossible to fill them. The President has devolved upon him under the Constitution the duty to see that the laws are executed. He can only execute them through the instrumentality of the officers whom Congress provides. Immediately before the adjournment Congress enacts a law and provides for an officer to execute that law. It is the duty of the President to see that that law is immediately executed. Now, is it possible that the duty is devolved upon him by Congress to execute the provisions of a law, and yet that he has not the power under the Constitution to discharge that duty? The necessity of the case has compelled the construction which I believe the Senator admits to have been uniform; it is the construction which the executive department of the Government has uniformly put upon this provision of the Constitution.

Mr. HOWARD. I referred to the practical construction given to that clause of the Constitution. I do not deny that the practical construction of it has been in accordance with the statement of the Senator.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; I so understood the Senator.

Mr. HOWARD. But we have the question up before us now de novo. It is to us a new question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is before Congress on a proposition of legislation, and that involves the proper construction of this clause of the Constitution.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The clause is that the President shall fill vacancies happening during the recess; and the naked question is whether a vacancy existing at the time of the adjournment is a vacancy happening during the following recess, and the uniform construction of the executive department has been that that vacancy ought to be filled, and I have given, from Secretary Seward's correspondence with the Senator from Michigan on behalf of the Judiciary Committee, an extreme case, a case where Congress devolves upon the President the duty to execute a law and provides an officer to execute it so near the adjournment that there is not time to nominate a person to fill the office before the adjournment. Here may be a period of many months before the Senate shall be again in session, and Congress passes a law so shortly before the adjournment that it is impossible for the President to make a nomination and for the Senate to act upon that nomination before the adjournment. Now, the question is whether the construction given by the executive department has not become the fixed construction of the Constitution on this subject, such as to control our consciences in legislating upon it.

Another instance is suggested: an officer is discharging very important duties at some distant point; it may be in California or it may be at some foreign position; he may die during the session of the Senate, and the President not hear of the death, the President not know of the vacancy until after the adjournment of Congress. Now, you say by this law that during all the following recess that vacancy shall not be filled, and this not because of any evil which has come to the public service by the exercise of this power, but simply because a man may be placed in that position whose political opinions are not agreeable to the majority of Congress.

I ask Senators if it is policy to enact such a law, if there may be any injury to the public service by changing the construction which has been uniformly put upon this provision of the Constitution. The case given by Secretary Seward is a strong one; the case which has been suggested to me is another strong one. Are the laws to be executed during the recess? If so, they must be executed through the officers provided by law. If those officers cannot be appointed in particular cases, the laws cannot be executed.

Let me suppose another case. The President sends a nomination to the Senate and the Senate holds that nomination until very nearly the adjournment, and Senators know that that very frequently happens; the nominations are in this body sometimes months before they are acted upon, and on perhaps the very day of the adjournment a nomination may be rejected and it is impossible for the President to fill the place before the adjournment. The public service requires that the duties of that office should be discharged. Now, are Senators willing for partisan purposes to say that that office shall be vacant, and that the public interests and the interests of the people shall suffer for fear that some man may be appointed, temporarily appointed, whose office cannot continue longer than the close of the next session, whose political views are not agreeable to the majority? That is the question.

Because of these considerations I have felt it to be my duty to move to strike that part of the section out, because I believe that under the construction which has been given to the Constitution we cannot enact such a law, and because I believe further that if we have the power it is a very dangerous thing to exercise it as is proposed. The service may suffer.

Mr. HOWARD. I have but a word to say in reply to the Senator from Indiana. He discovers an inconvenience arising from the construction of the Constitution for which I contend. Undoubtedly, there may be cases of inconvenience.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me, I will suggest another case. Suppose a nomination is made and confirmed on the last day of the session, or within a few days before the adjournment, and the party nominated afterward declines to accept the position. The office, in that case, would never have been devolved upon him, and his failure to accept it would not be the cause of a vacancy, because he never became an officer and never accepted the office; the previous vacancy was never filled, because to fill it required his acceptance. There would be a vacancy without fault anywhere. Shall that vacancy go unfilled?

Mr. HOWARD. Not only that inconvenience, but a thousand others may possibly arise from this construction for which I contend; but the great question before us is: what does the Constitution itself mean, what is the true interpretation of its language? The language is that the President may fill up a vacancy which may happen during the recess of the Senate. The vacancy which he may fill up must happen during a given period of time, between the beginning and the end of that period of time, that is to say, the recess of the Senate. It must happen between the moment of the adjournment of the Senate and the moment of the commencement of its next session; and it must be a "vacancy." What is a vacancy in an office? As I said before, we must refer to the common law for light upon the subject. Now, I understand that, properly speaking, there can be no vacancy in an office where there never has been an incumbent, for the absence of the incumbent who has once been appointed, whether that absence be occasioned by death, resignation, or lawful means, is the vacancy; the vacancy in the sense of the Constitution.

Now, sir, if the power of the President in making these temporary appointments is, by the fair construction of the Constitution, confined to this particular period of time, then we must be content with it, and so must he. He cannot constitutionally issue a commission to fill a vacancy which did not occur during that exact period of time, mathematically ascertainable. If the vacancy occurred at any other time, it is not to be filled in that way; and I reject entirely the doctrine under which the Executive at present seems to be practicing, that it is perfectly immaterial at what time a vacancy takes place or occurs. That doctrine leads to the complete divestiture of the Senate of all its power over the question of appointments to office. And it leads to it in this way: first, the power of final appointment is held to belong to the President, and to him alone. The power of appointment carries with it, according to the opposite argument, the unconditional, unrestrained power of removal from office; because, as is alleged, the President having this absolute power of appointment may exercise it when he pleases, and he may exercise it, as it has been exercised all along, in this shape, appointing to an office which already has an incumbent, the appointing of a successor operating, as is argued, as a removal of the predecessor; in other words, that the power of removal is a part and parcel of the power of appointment; that the power of appointment cannot be exercised in its plenitude and efficiency without annexing to it the unrestricted, unconditional power of removal.

If this be so, and if the doctrine be correct that the President has a right to issue commissions to fill an office a vacancy in which has occurred at any time, either during the session or during the recess, the whole power of the Senate over the question of appointments is gone, and he has but to renew from session to session his temporary commission to keep the incumbent in office perpetually, in spite of the Senate. An opinion of the present Attorney General was published in the newspapers some time during the last summer which, if I recollect rightly, went to this extent: that it is the right of the President to fill a vacancy whenever that vacancy may have occurred, whether during the recess or during the session, for the reason that it would be inconvenient, in his opinion, and injurious to the public service, were the President not vested with such a power. Sir, to me that is not a constitutional principle. The Constitution fixes the period of time within which the vacancy shall happen. The vacancy is to happen within a given period. "To happen" is to occur by accident, chance, casualty, or some means unforeseen; at all events, not by means which are within the control of the agent himself who is to fill the vacancy, for that is to make nonsense of the word "happen," and to give to the expression "during the recess of the Senate," to which it is conjoined and which qualifies it, no meaning, force, or effect whatever.

The honorable Senator refers to a hypothetical case which I think may have taken place in practice, where we pass a law creating an office, and owing to the lateness of the period of the session at which the bill becomes a law the President has not had time to fill the office by a regular appointment by and with the consent of the Senate. I presume such cases have happened not unfrequently. It would be an inconvenience; but it does not follow that because it is an inconvenience the President has a right to fill it in vacation. That is pressing the argument ad inconvenienti to an extreme.

Sir, there is an easy remedy for just such a case. The honorable Senator need not be told that it is in the power of the President at any moment to call the Senate together in extra session for the very purpose of acting upon executive nominations and transacting other executive business. It would not be a very great inconvenience to the Senate to be called together for such a purpose, and it would be, very plainly to my mind, the duty of the President to call them together for that purpose, if the office was one of great public importance, a thing which has been done repeatedly in the history of the Government, and almost every year.

He refers to the case of the death of some officer residing at a remote point during the session of the Senate, and the inconvenience which would arise if the President were not authorized by the Constitution, should he hear of this death during the vacation, to be able to fill it. Undoubtedly there might be some damage to the public interest arising from the accident, but where in any Government on earth do we find guards and barriers against every possible inconvenience that can arise in the course of the administration of public affairs? These accidents are liable to arise at all times and in all Governments, not only in our own but in every other Government, and from the very nature of government itself the community cannot be guarded against their occurrence; the thing is impossible. No Constitution, no statute can meet every case that may possibly arise. No, sir; the framers of the instrument made it as wisely as they were able, and they have left to us among other rich legacies the care and protection of this Constitution. They have said in plain words that the President may fill all vacancies that may happen during a particular period, and the implication is irresistible that they intended to exclude this power in every case that did not occur during that particular period. I think myself they were wise in so doing, and I am disposed to stand by the old instrument until the people of the United States shall see fit to alter it.

As to the long practical construction that has been given to this clause, I admit the force of such a practical construction in legislation as well as law; but it is to be observed that this question of the power of removal has never been considered as completely at rest. The best minds in the country have all along doubted and disputed the unlimited right of the President to turn incumbents out of office in the recess. The example was first set to the country under the administration of General Jackson who made an indiscriminate removal of all officers who were opposed to his policy, he going upon the ground, first probably suggested to him by the Albany regency, that "to the victors belong the spoils;" and I am free to say that I think no fact in our history has tended so strongly and effectually to corrupt the public mind, and, if I may so speak, the political morality of the nation, as this doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils." It makes almost every man who gives a vote a scambler and an aspirant for office, and "office," "office," from the dawn of day to the setting of the sun, is the cry of the hungry crowd besetting, not only us here, but every man throughout the country who is supposed to exercise some influence in the bestowment of these precious articles. I hope this Congress will do something toward checking this spirit of office-seeking, fostered and upheld as it has been by this misconception and misuse of the Constitution of our fathers.

Mr. JOHNSON. My friend from Indiana has correctly told the Senate, from the beginning of the Government the construction has been—and it has been acted upon by every President from Washington to the present time—that under the clause which gives the President the right to fill vacancies which may happen, he has that power in all cases where there is an office vacant in point of fact. The obvious reasons for giving him the power were stated by my friend from Indiana. The Government cannot get on unless the offices are filled, and as the Constitution gives no authority to any other Department of the Government to act during the recess but the President, if he has not the power to fill a vacancy which may exist during the recess of the Senate the office is unfilled, and the public interest, so far as it may be connected with the exercise of the duties of that office, suffers.

Now, it would be idle to say—because I know that gentlemen here entertain a very decided opinion upon the point different from that which the Government has heretofore practiced on, and it would be very improper to say that the clause in the Constitution under which the President has acted is so plain as to admit but of the interpretation that the Government has heretofore given to it. The language of the Constitution in the provision which immediately follows the clause that gives to the President the general power to appoint by and with the advice and consent of the Senate is, that "the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen." What is the meaning of the word "happen" as there used? It is necessary perhaps to supply a word to make the meaning clearly intelligent. It presents a case of what grammarians call an ellipsis, and in a case of that description it is for the commentator, or him who is called upon to construe the Constitution, to fill that ellipsis with the words which he thinks will carry out the purpose of the power. Now, if you fill the ellipsis with the words "to exist," the authority of the President is very clear. If you fill it with the words "to occur," it is equally clear that the President would not have the power.

The law officers of the Government (and they were led to give that interpretation to it by the necessity under which the Government might be placed) have construed the words used in the Constitution to mean "vacancies happening to exist." So read, the authority of the President would be very clear, and I do not know why we are not just as much at liberty to supply the omitted words by adopting the words "to exist," as to supply them by adopting the words "to occur," even looking at it as a matter of grammatical construction. But when in addition to what would be a fair interpretation of the clause as a mere matter of grammatical construction we take into consideration what would be the consequence of a different interpretation, the argument seems to me to be irresistible. We may have—and I refer to the fact now as illustrative of what I am about to say, as I referred to it yesterday for the purpose of illustrating what I then said on another subject—we may have very delicate negotiations abroad. There may be, as was the case during the war of 1812, negotiations going on between our minister and the minister of the nation with which we have been at war, upon which hangs the peace of the country, which is to decide whether the war is to be continued or is to terminate. We have a minister there to represent us upon that grave question, that vital question. He dies. On the 4th of March we hear for the first time of his death. The Senate has adjourned. As the law stood originally it could not meet again until the following December; so that during the whole period that is to elapse from the 4th of March in the year when we are advised of the death of our minister abroad and the succeeding first Monday in December that vacancy cannot be supplied.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Maryland whether the President has it not in his power to call the Senate together without a regular meeting of Congress, to advise him in respect to the filling of that very vacancy which may occur?

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course he can call the Senate together; but is he to call the Senate together on the happening of each such contingency as I have stated?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends upon its importance.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was that the purpose of the Constitution? The very provision which gives him the power to fill a vacancy necessarily shows that in the judgment of the Convention which framed the Constitution it was not necessary to call the Senate together for any such purpose, because the necessity to call the Senate together to act upon vacancies that may happen during the session of the Senate and vacancies that may occur during the recess of the Senate would equally render it necessary (if that is the most advisable way of making appointments) to call the Senate together in all such cases; and yet no Senate has been called together for any such purpose. The only instances in which the Senate have been called together are at the commencement of a presidential term when the incoming President desires to have the nominations of his Cabinet ministers acted upon. There is no other case, and that is only for a few days.

The same thing is equally true of a great many very important offices. You have a circuit judge in the circuit of which Vermont constitutes a part, and you have a district judge whose official duties are confined to the State of Vermont. They both die at the latter end of our session here. We do not know it; not a Senator is advised of it. The Senate adjourns. Is the whole administration of the jurisprudence of the United States in the circuit of which Vermont constitutes a district to be suspended until the Senate shall meet in the next December? My friend says it can be avoided by calling the Senate together. That takes time. We have a very large country now. The telegraph may carry with the speed of lightning the intelligence of any facts which may occur; but the members cannot get together by telegraph—as yet at any rate. The Senators from the Pacific, to say nothing of those who are on this side and who are a great way off, cannot get here for twenty-five or thirty days. Are they to be brought here for that purpose, and is mileage to be paid to them? If they are to be brought here they ought to have their mileage. And how often are they to be brought? If there is any weight in my friend's suggestion, they are to be brought whenever an occasion occurs which renders it necessary to the interest of the public that the office should be filled, and then another mileage is to be paid, and so on from time to time.

The section of the bill which my friend from Indiana moves to amend uses in the first clause of it precisely the words of the Constitution:

And be it further enacted, That the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate.

Precisely the words of the Constitution, except that it goes on to specify in part the causes which may produce the vacancy by saying, "by reason of death, resignation, expiration of term of office, or other lawful cause," which takes in all the causes that may produce a vacancy. It is therefore nothing but a repetition of the language of the Constitution, and gives to the President the power to appoint, or rather to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate. The Attorney General will perhaps give the same opinion that that means, "happen to exist," following the unanimous construction which has been placed upon it by all the law officers of the Government to whom the question has been submitted, and sustained by the action of every President—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the bill is not objectionable in that respect.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know it is not. So far it is free from all objection except this: that it is unnecessary; it is reaffirming in the form of a law what we have in the Constitution, and that constitutes the only objection to it. But it is the latter part of the section which the particular amendment proposes to strike out that is in my judgment very objectionable. The vacancy being filled now, you do not take from the President the right to fill it:

And if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to such office so vacant or temporarily filled as aforesaid, during such next session of the Senate, such office shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto until the same shall be filled by appointment thereto, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Then the office cannot be filled. That occurs. The vacancy may exist for the first time the day before the Senate meets. This section says that in that case the President shall have power to fill it. The Constitution expressly provides—and I beg my friend from Vermont to reflect upon the effect of that provision—that in the case of every appointment which the President may make during the recess to fill a vacancy, the commission which he is to give to the officer shall continue until the last day of the next session. You say it shall not by that part of the bill which the Senator from Indiana proposes to strike out. You do not say so in words; but you say that if the President sends in that man's name and you reject him, or he sends in the name of anybody else and you reject him, the office shall be vacant from the date of the rejection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We do not say that. We simply say that "if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to such office so vacant, or temporarily filled as aforesaid"—and that may be the same or some other person, and if another that man's commission would still continue until the end of the session—"during such next session of the Senate such office shall remain in abeyance." No fair construction of that language, it appears to me, can torture it into an attempt to limit the term of this officer who has been properly temporarily appointed until the end of that session. I do not see how my friend from Maryland can make that out, even on a special demurrer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to the fifth and sixth lines of this section, which perhaps he has overlooked. The provision is:

That the President shall have power to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate by reason of death, resignation, expiration of term of office, or other lawful cause, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session thereafter.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That expressly recognizes the right of the person so temporarily appointed to hold his office until the end of the session.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was perfectly aware of that provision. That is in accordance with the constitutional clause. The Constitution says the same thing, the law says the same; but what is the benefit to the officer of having a commission which is not to expire until the end of the next session if he is to get no salary during any part of that time? The provision, as I understand, is that he who is appointed during the recess, unless he is again, after the termination of the recess, during the session of the Senate, appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, gets no salary, and if he is rejected by the Senate the office from that date is to be considered as in abeyance without any salary, fees, &c., attached thereto.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You interpolate the words "from that date."

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, it means that if it means anything.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member would say "from the termination of the session of the Senate" the clause would not be so objectionable; but does he mean to say that the commission shall extend up to the first day of the session of the Senate that may occur subsequent to the appointment of the President?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, subsequent to the first appointment which he is authorized to make; and it is impossible to put any other construction on the words.

Mr. JOHNSON. But according to the view of the honorable member in the case supposed he is not authorized to fill the vacancy. But, sir, I have said all that I proposed to say, except with reference to the concluding part of the section which it is proposed to strike out. It provides that the duties are to be discharged by some other person connected with the particular office; but there are a great many offices for whom there is no person provided to perform the duties during a vacancy—a foreign minister for instance, a judge; nobody connected with the judiciary could discharge the duties of the office except the judge; so that while that admits the necessity of having the duties of the office discharged, it does not provide a sufficient remedy for the contingency which it contemplates may exist.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to make any general reply to the observations of my friend from Indiana, or the very interesting remarks of my friend from Maryland at this time, for I have not the physical ability to do it, but merely to say in reply for a moment to my friend from Indiana, that there is no very great detriment to the public service which he has so glowingly depicted as that of allowing one branch of the Government to appropriate to itself or to absorb the exercise of the functions that properly belong to another branch; and in my opinion (assuming for the moment, as I expect to be able to prove by and by, that the functions which we attempt to protect the Senate in the exercise of by this bill properly belong to it,) there is no practical difficulty, there is no unpleasant conjuncture of affairs in the way of inconvenience and trouble, which would justify us for a moment in omitting to provide for the protection of those functions and powers that belong to us. If the Constitution has reposed them in us, it is our duty, at whatever expense of trouble and inconvenience, to perform them. It is the duty of the President, whenever the occasion arises in which it shall be necessary for him conjointly with us to perform them, it is his business to give us information of the fact and call us together to act.

And I wish to say a single word further as a temporary reply to what fell from the Senator from Indiana. He has stigmatized this measure as being one pushed forward for partisan purposes, reversing the settled construction of the Constitution, exposing the public service of the Government to great injury and inconvenience, in order that the political friends of the party in power may be protected or may be avenged if they have suffered anything, as the case may be. Now, sir, speaking for myself, and I think speaking for a majority of the party to whom I belong, I repudiate totally and absolutely any such accusation. The functions which we are endeavoring to protect will belong as much to the Senate (if that singular millennium should ever happen to come) when it shall be composed of a majority of the friends of the Senator from Indiana, as they do as it is now constituted. We are not legislating for men; this is a Government of laws, not of men. We are merely protecting the functions of a body to whom the Constitution has intrusted in part the execution of the laws in being a coordinate branch with the President and a concurring branch in the selection of all the agents of the Government. That is what we are doing. I do not, therefore, choose to submit to the imputation for a single moment that there is either in this bill or out of it, in respect to the spirit in which it is proposed, any attempt to advance anybody's political views whatever or to aid anybody's friends. It is an attempt to restore the practice of the Government to its true original theory, and to preserve to this body, which Mr. Madison, one of the authors of the Constitution, declared to be the great anchor of the Government, some of those high powers and duties of which practically it has been stripped.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As illustrating the views I have expressed on the point made by the Senator from Michigan, I wish to cite one or two cases. On the 3d of March, 1863, an act was passed "to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho." That act required for its execution the appointment of a Governor, of a secretary, of judges, so that there might be a government established out there. It was passed during the day some time, and approved on the 8d of March, perhaps twelve, perhaps twenty-four hours before the adjournment of Congress. Now, I submit to any Senator whether the Congress of the United States understood that the President was not to execute that law, whether any Senator dreamed that he was to fill all those offices during the six, ten, twelve, or twenty-four hours that intervened before the adjournment of Congress? Did any Senator expect that of him? None. It was impossible; he could not select the right men in that time. He had to consider of it; it was a matter requiring a good deal of consideration. Here were important officers to be appointed to establish a new government for a people in the distant West.

Again, sir, on the 3d of March, 1865, a law was passed "to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees." That bill provided for a Commissioner to be at the head of the entire establishment. This government within a government was to extend over the rebellious States, and this Commissioner of the bureau was to be at the head of the entire business. The execution of the law required the very first thing that he should be appointed, and yet the law was passed within but a few hours of the adjournment of Congress.

Now I ask of Senators two questions: first, was it expected that that important officer would be selected by the President and his nomination sent to the Senate and confirmed within the few hours before the adjournment? and in the second place, if that was not practicable, which it was not, as a matter of course, or probably not, at least, then was it anticipated by Congress that that law should not be executed during the nine months before the meeting of the Senate again, provided that there should be no session of the Senate in the mean time? It is true an extra session of the Senate was called on the 4th of March after the adjournment, but Congress had no control of that. That session was not called with a view to the confirmation of this particular officer. Whether he was confirmed at that extra session I am not prepared to say; but I am citing this as an instance.

Here was a law that it was expected would be put in force. It was the duty of the President to execute it. He could not execute it except by the appointment of an officer. This was all contemplated by Congress when they passed the law at an hour of the session when it was impossible for the President to make a nomination and for the nomination to be confirmed.

The only reply that is or can be made is, that whenever a vacancy of that sort might occur the Senate should be called to consider the nomination. I think that is not practicable, and it is, to say the least of it, very inconvenient.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Allow me to ask, would it not be easy in cases of that kind, if this becomes a law, to provide in the law creating the office for a special appointment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Why, Mr. President, I am talking of the construction that Congress has put on this clause of the Constitution. The construction put upon it by the executive department has been uniform since, I believe, the very first session of the First Congress under the Constitution; and now I refer to a case in which the Congress of the United States has put upon it a construction by passing a law at the last hours of the session, when it was impossible that there should be a confirmation of a nomination. Every Senator knows that the attention of the President for the last day or two of the session is occupied in considering the bills that are passed. Congress might have provided as the Senator suggests possibly; but it would have been a singular provision. It would have been a funny law. If it could have been illustrated in some of the pictorials, such a law as that would have been vastly amusing. But it was not done. I am simply speaking of what Congress did do.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do not think the Senator understands me. If this bill shall become a law, hereafter, when an office is created at the end of the session, will it not be easy in the law creating the office to provide for a special appointment in that particular case by the President to run until the next regular meeting of Congress?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If that be so, what is the use of passing this? Why not leave him where the Constitution leaves him? The Senator from Iowa suggests the statesman-like proposition that Congress shall, by general provision of law, provide that a vacancy shall not be filled by the President, provided that vacancy existed at the adjournment of the Senate, and then to meet the practical troubles which will be found every year, he suggests that in each particular law we shall for that particular case repeal this general law which he says must now be passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend from Indiana allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to remind him, because I need not inform him, for he is undoubtedly aware of it, that he has forgotten that there are many instances in the legislation of Congress when new offices have been created by law where in order to give the President power to fill them in the vacation for the first time an express provision to that effect has been inserted in the act of Congress; so that there is no such practical construction on that point as my friend from Indiana seems to suppose on his side of the question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What law does the Senator refer to?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can refer the Senator to several instances, but have not the memoranda at hand at this moment. There are several such instances.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot question what the Senator says; but his compliment to my intelligence is not deserved. I have not observed them. I shall not question what he says, that they exist. I referred to his case as showing the construction Congress has put on this provision of the Constitution.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Indiana puts the question whether it was not expected in the cases to which he referred that the President should fill these offices by temporary appointments during the vacation. I suppose that is the point of his question, offices created at one session of Congress to which no regular appointment has been made during that session of the Senate. Well, sir, in the view which the Senator takes of that matter, it seems that he construes the action of Congress, or rather of the Senate, in adjourning and going home, as an assent to the power of the President to fill the offices thus created.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator does not state it exactly as I undertook to state it.

Mr. HOWARD. Perhaps I do not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am speaking of laws passed at the session when Congress necessarily adjourns on the 4th of March. On the 3d of March Congress passes laws requiring the appointment of important officers to execute laws passed at that date. Now, I say the Senate contemplated that the President should make those appointments after consideration, after an opportunity to consider the claims of the different applicants that should be made.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not think that Congress contemplated any such thing. They have not said so in any statute or in any resolution. They leave the matter to stand upon the Constitution. They always leave it there as a matter of course.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to ask him a question? The act organizing the Freedmen's Bureau was passed on the 3d of March. I think the Senator will concede that it was practically impossible for the President to consider of his nomination at that hour of the session. The Senator knows that the President's attention at that time is entirely occupied with the examination of bills with a view to his signature. The Senator knows that at the short session more perhaps than one half of the laws are approved on the 3d of March. Now, a law passed of that character establishing the Freedmen's Bureau, would the Senator have held the President to be without blame if he left that law unexecuted for nine months when the Senate necessarily adjourned within a few hours after the passage of the law? Was it the duty of the President to execute that law?

Mr. HOWARD. As to the duty of the President to execute the laws I wish to say one word. He is bound by his oath of office to see that the laws are faithfully executed. There is no doubt about this obligation, nor the form in which it is assumed; he is sworn to do so; but if the Senator from Indiana takes the ground that the President of the United States can constitutionally derive from that grant of power any authority whatever which is not granted to him in other portions of the Constitution, then I must say that I differ entirely with the Senator from Indiana. The oath of office of the President of the United States gives him no power whatever; he derives no additional authority or additional functions from his mere oath of office; he is sworn to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and of course as Congress make the laws and impose this obligation upon him it is their duty to provide the proper and necessary instruments to enable him to perform this duty to which he is thus sworn. He uses, and he can use, only such instrumentalities as are furnished him by statute of the United States for the purpose of seeing that the laws are faithfully executed. He derives no additional authority from that clause of the Constitution. Congress are under oath, and each member of Congress takes an oath faithfully to discharge his duty, and he is sworn to furnish the necessary facilities to the President in the shape of legislation to enable him to perform his duties; and that is the beginning and the middle and the end of the whole thing. If Congress fail to furnish the necessary instruments, then the President of the United States is blameless if the laws go unexecuted; because it is not his fault, but, on the contrary, the fault of Congress. We stand in the place of the responsible party.

Well, sir, as to the particular case put by the honorable Senator from Indiana, the head of the Freedmen's Bureau was not appointed at the particular session to which he refers. The President on the 3d of March, he tells us, is usually engaged in the examination of bills. True, he generally is; it is inconvenient and in some cases perhaps it may be said to be morally impossible that he should on that day, before the close of the session, fill the office. I grant that; but what is the logical consequence? Nothing, except his inability to perform a duty which rested upon him. But here is a further facility placed in the hands of the President. He sees when he reads the bill on the 3d of March that it requires the appointment of an officer to perform the functions created by the statute; he is unable on that day to designate a proper person to the Senate to fill the office. The Constitution enables him at any time to call the Senate together; he may by a single word of his mouth direct a note to be published in a newspaper, or a note to be sent to each member of the Senate, convening them on the 4th of March, for the purpose of acting upon executive nominations, and this one among others; and that has been the usage of the President from the beginning of the Government. At the close of almost every session of Congress the Senate has been detained in executive session.

Mr. CONNESS. Every short session.

Mr. HOWARD. And I think occasionally at the end of every long session where cases of this kind came up. It is the commonest thing in the world. He has the power to fill the office by regular appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, if he will take the trouble to notify the Senators to be in their seats. Is there any difficulty whatever in that? Certainly the honorable Senator, in the face of these constitutional provisions and this usage, cannot, I think, contend that it was the understanding of Congress on the 3d of March that the President should make a temporary appointment to fill this so-called vacancy during the recess of the Senate. I do not see how the two things are connected with each other; I do not see any immediate connection between the gentleman's premises and his conclusion, in other words. The Constitution affords every facility for the appointment to office by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; while on the other hand it does not, for it cannot provide for every casualty, every contingency, in the public service, and against every inconvenience that may arise from death, from resignation, or from other accident. It would be necessary, in order to guard against every such inconvenience, to enlarge the Constitution to the dimensions of the statutes themselves, and even beyond that size in order to meet all those contingencies.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will furnish to my friend from Indiana one of the precedents to which I alluded, and there is any number of them. This one goes back to the good old times when no partisan motives which he seems to be so suspicious of can be imputed to Congress or to the President. By the act of the 7th of May, 1822, providing for certain collection districts in Florida, it was declared that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, should appoint a collector and surveyor for each of the districts, and then it proceeded to provide further:

"But the President, in the recess of the Senate, may make temporary appointments of any such collector or surveyor, whose commission shall expire in forty days from the commencement of the next session of Congress thereafter."

So that at that time, as at all the other times to which I have referred, when new offices were created, it was thought necessary to confer upon the President the express power of filling up those offices unless they were filled before the Senate adjourned.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to move an executive session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator give way to me a moment to make a motion in connection with this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the bill with the amendments be printed, so that we can see on Monday morning what the amendments are. The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew my motion. The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 11, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RIFLE CANNON.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that the Navy of the United States is unprovided with rifle cannon of large caliber, corresponding with those used in European service; and whereas experiments have been made by American citizens in the construction of wrought-iron cannon of large caliber, suitable for rifle shot and calculated to supply the alleged deficiency in the naval ordnance of the United States, if any such deficiency in fact exists:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed from this House, with power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses under oath, and fully to inquire and report to this House as to the facts of such alleged deficiency of rifle cannon of large caliber in the naval service of the United States, and to ascertain and report what experiments, if any, have been made by citizens of the United States to supply such deficiency, and the result of such experiments; and to ascertain and report to this House what transactions, if any, have been made between the Secretary of the Navy or other Departments of the Government and citizens of the United States in relation to the construction of wrought-iron cannon of heavy caliber, and whether there are any sums equitably due from the Government in consequence of such transactions, and to report by bill for the payment of the same, and to report by bill or otherwise such measures as may be required to place the Navy of the United States in the supply of rifle cannon of heavy caliber upon equality with the navies of Europe.

Mr. COBB. I object.

PACIFIC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of having ocean mail service between San Francisco, in California, to Astoria and Portland, in Oregon, for the transmission of printed and other matter, thereby making the ocean mail service continuous from New York, via the Isthmus and San Francisco, to Portland, Oregon, avoiding the destruction of public documents and other printed matter by long and unnecessary overland exposure and injury; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MILLER asked and obtained leave of absence for one week.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. DELANO called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The pending question when the House adjourned last evening was the admission of the State of Nebraska, but that order is superseded by a rule of the House which will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Friday and Saturday of every week shall be set apart for private bills and private business in preference to any other, unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the House."

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to postpone the prior order, and take up the bill for the compensation of clerks.

Mr. DELANO. I hope it will not be done. The private business deserves the attention of the House, and I hope it will devote this day to the legitimate business.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have twice given way to other business.

Mr. McKEE. Is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The motion admits of very limited debate.

Mr. KASSON. I would suggest that it is important that the House should go into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill to-day. It has been laid aside for some time, and it is very important that we should send it to the Senate. The session is advancing, and we have sent no appropriation bills of any magnitude to the other body. I therefore appeal to the gentleman to allow us to go into Committee of the Whole, notwithstanding the assignment of the day for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DELANO. I am constrained to say to the gentleman, whom it would give me pleasure at any time to accommodate, that I do not feel that the state of the Private Calendar justifies me now in granting his request.

Mr. KASSON. Then I ask if my friend cannot take up the most important measures of a private nature, and at the close of an hour give way to a motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DELANO. I will endeavor to do so.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. GARFIELD to postpone the regular order, it was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has commenced, and the first business in order is the call of the committees of reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee of Claims, where the call rested on the last private bill day, December 14.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely on the following petitions and other papers, namely:

Nehemiah Osborn, the State of New York, certain companies of the Michigan militia, Horatio Nater, J. H. Atkinson, S. B. Kidd, L. D. Page, in behalf of Eunice Satterlee, Miss M. Victor, Henry Zeigler, Voltaire Randall and E. G. Homer, Strothers Motens, F. A. Aiken, David Hicks, Edwin L. Drake, John Boem, Mary A. Palmer, Cynthia Mullins, A. E. Damas, Dory Nell, Elias Dunbar, D. Eglington Barr, Trustees Southern College at Bowling Green, Kentucky, and joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the account of C. F. Fay.

Mr. DELANO moved that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the same; which was agreed to, and the said papers were laid on the table.

Mr. DELANO also moved that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions, namely:

Mrs. Nancy Bills, Charles Kahn, jr., the ladies of French Creek, West Virginia, Dr. James Taylor, A. Walker, Obed Blowers, Robert H. Isbell, John Todd, Thomas Nugen, Pardon Worsley, Edward Van Wart, Wiley Jones, James E. Palmer, James P. Strother, Barrington Bekymer, Isaac C. Noe, Alexander Dunbar, Amos Sanford, David Foster, Catharine N. Croft, George W. Elliott, David T. Hawes, Bennett Cook, and Major Lorenzo Thomas, United States Army.

The motion was agreed to; and the petitions were laid upon the table.

Mr. DELANO also moved that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions and bills, namely:

Beverly D. Williams, Richard Dunbar, the Atlantic and Sun Mutual Insurance Companies of New York, Thomas Garner, James A. Russell, Thomas C. Sullivan, C. De Ronceray, Levi Ferguson, Dr. Philip Adolphus, Joseph C. G. Kennedy, E. E. Shedd, George H. Wright, Barney Eagan, G. L. Beach, John Burke & Co., Henry Beutel, Woods Mabury, Samuel H. Patterson, George Wohrly, Timothy Ragan, John Netler, Jacob Killinger, and of Mrs. Eliza Allard and others, citizens of Paducah, Kentucky, and the bill of the House No. 175, to authorize the payment of the claim of the State of New Hampshire for certain services of her militia during the war of 1812.

The motion was agreed to; and the petitions and bill laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the said reports were laid upon the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE HENRY PREBLE.

Mr. DELANO, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, bill of the Senate No. 176, for the relief of George Henry Preble, a commander in the Navy of the United States, and moved that the same be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table; and I call for the reading of the report. I know something of this case and I think it is a meritorious one.

The report was read.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would like to say—

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is not debatable, except by unanimous consent, as the original motion to lay the bill on the table was not debatable.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suggest that the report be laid over until the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. LYNCH,] representing the district to which Commander Preble belongs, can make an examination of the case. He is not now present. I would like, therefore, to have this motion to reconsider laid over on that account. I do not concur in the report of the Committee of Claims from what I know of the case.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] had better by unanimous consent withdraw the report.

Mr. DELANO. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I prefer that the bill shall remain where it now is.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill is laid upon the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I ask that the motion to reconsider shall be postponed until Friday next.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is upon reconsidering the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table, and that question is not debatable.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, I think it is very hard action against a gallant officer.

Mr. DELANO. I hope that the gentleman who interposed an objection to the postponement of the motion to reconsider will withdraw it, as I wish to accommodate the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] It will save me the necessity of withdrawing the report.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the chairman of the Committee of Claims will withdraw this report for the present.

Mr. DELANO. I will do so if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent, as the bill has been laid upon the table by a vote of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection.

Mr. ANCONA. I call for the question on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 51, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Mr. DELANO. What will be the effect of this action?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to reconsider prevails, the effect will be to bring the House again to a vote upon the question "Shall the bill lie upon the table?"

Tellers were ordered on the motion to reconsider; and Messrs. HARDING, of Illinois, and BLAINE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 39.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. BLAINE. That question is not debatable, but I believe it is in order for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] to withdraw the report.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent, but the report having been made by the authority of a committee, the gentleman cannot withdraw it himself.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope no gentleman will object to having the report withdrawn in order that the House, at some future day—not just now—may give it impartial consideration.

No objection was made; and accordingly leave was granted, and Mr. DELANO withdrew the report.

SURETIES OF JAMES T. POLLOCK.

Mr. DELANO also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the House No. 840, for the relief of the sureties of James T. Pollock, the question being upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. DELANO. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage now.

Mr. PRICE. Is there any report accompanying this bill?

Mr. DELANO. There is a report, but I can perhaps state the principal facts more briefly than the report.

Mr. PRICE. If the gentleman prefers to make an oral statement of the facts rather than have the report read I will not insist upon the reading of the report. But I think we should have some statement of the facts before we are called upon to vote for a bill of this character.

Mr. DELANO. In 1837 this Pollock was appointed receiver of the land office in Indiana, and gave bond and surety with twenty-six sureties. One year afterward he was discovered to be a defaulter in the sum of $6,000. Immediately afterward a distress warrant—according to the practice at that time, as I understand—was issued for the collection of the amount of this defalcation and placed in the hands of Marshal Taylor, of Indiana. At the time the warrant was placed in the hands of the marshal Pollock was possessed of unincumbered real estate of the value of $20,000. The marshal holding this distress warrant neglected to levy and proceed with the warrant until this real estate of Pollock became incumbered by subsequent judgments, which entirely consumed it. Suit was then brought against the marshal for non-feasance; that suit was continued from term to term until 1851. In 1850, by some means, a bill was passed by Congress releasing Marshal Taylor and his sureties from the liability growing out of their non-feasance in executing the distress warrant against Pollock. So that the property of Pollock was gone in consequence of the neglect of the marshal of the General Government; and the Government then stepped in and abandoned all its claims against Taylor, the marshal. Now, after a lapse of twenty years, and when all of the twenty-six sureties of Pollock, except three, are either dead or insolvent, the Government is proceeding to collect the debt from the sureties.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will my colleague [Mr. DELANO] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DELANO. I will.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to state that it appears that in the case of a collector of customs at Petersburg, Virginia, there was a similar defalcation on the part of the collector, and a voluntary release of the sureties upon his bond. The Thirty-Sixth Congress, by an almost unanimous vote, released the sureties under circumstances similar to those just stated by my colleague.

Mr. DELANO. It will be observed by those who have heard me that it was through the non-feasance or malfeasance of an officer of the Government that this debt was not collected from the principal, who at the time had sufficient property unincumbered to satisfy the debt. And then the Government voluntarily surrendered its claim against its officer who was guilty of this neglect.

Mr. DRIGGS. Can the gentleman state how long after the distress warrant was issued was it before the property of Pollock became incumbered?

Mr. DELANO. Some eight months, I understand.

Mr. ROSS. I would like the gentleman to inform the House how the original judgment was released.

Mr. DELANO. There never was any judgment in the case.

Mr. ROSS. There never was any judgment in the case? How could you have a distress warrant without a judgment?

Mr. DELANO. It was issued by the Treasury Department, according to the practice at that time.

Mr. ROSS. I do not think there is anything in this case to justify Congress in discharging these sureties. They became responsible to the Government, in default of the principal, to pay the Government this amount. I think the Government has made no statement to justify the action asked of us. I do not think we should set such a precedent at this time.

Mr. DELANO. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ROSS. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ERNEST F. KLEINSCHMIDT.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Ernest F. Kleinschmidt, of Cincinnati, Ohio; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read at length, proposes to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Ernest F. Kleinschmidt, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $1,250, to reimburse him for money to that amount paid by him to the collector of internal revenue for the second district of Ohio, for four city lots in Cincinnati, which were sold by the collector to Kleinschmidt for the payment of internal revenue tax, which tax was subsequently declared by the superior court of Cincinnati to have been illegally assessed, and the sale of the lots to have been null and void.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES HOOPER.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of James Hooper, of Baltimore, Maryland; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read at length, proposes to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Hooper $16,000, to reimburse him for the destruction and loss at sea of the bark General Berry while in the military service of the Government, on the 9th of July, 1864.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is there a report in this case?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to hear it read.

The SPEAKER. It will be read.

The Clerk read the report.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, any claim involving but a few hundred dollars, standing upon its own peculiar facts, and having been examined and reported upon by a committee of this House, ought generally, in my opinion, to be allowed to pass upon the judgment of the committee and the report which they make.

The amount of the present claim, however, is considerable; and the character of the claim is such as will make it a representative case for what may be a very large class of claims.

As I understand the facts in brief, the owner of this vessel undertook to convey from New York to Fortress Monroe a lot of hay and straw, at the rate of $7 50 per ton; and a bill of lading was signed in the usual form, with the exception that if the vessel was sent up the river from Fortress Monroe to unload, the war risk, as it is called, was to be assumed by the Government. It appears that this vessel was lost by being overhauled by a rebel cruiser. I did not understand from the report whether the carrier was held responsible for the loss of the cargo; I presume he was not; nor did I understand whether he had been paid for the carriage. If this fact is mentioned in the report my ear failed to catch it. Whether that was so or not I do not know that it would vary the condition of the case.

The question involved in the case is, whether a party employed as a common carrier, or in any other service that might be called civil service, or analogous to ordinary civil service in time of peace, stands in any different legal attitude from those who are employed by private parties. The auditor who, under the law of Congress, has examined this case, has decided that a party who undertakes to carry for the Government as a common carrier assumes precisely the same risks and the same responsibilities as a party carrying for private individuals. In this decision I think the auditor was clearly right. To hold that the Government is responsible for the loss of this vessel would, so far as I can see, make the Government liable for her loss in any other way—by going down upon a shoal which was not laid down on the charts, or by any other of the thousand casualties to which this kind of service is always liable.

It is urged that the presence of the rebel cruiser was not in this instance known. That may be true; but it was known that the sea was thus infested—

Mr. DELANO. Allow me, as I understand the morning hour is about to expire, to say there are some other matters the Committee of Claims desire to get before the House, and if this is going to lead to debate I hope the gentleman will yield and let me move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am not prepared to vote for this bill.

Mr. DELANO. At the suggestion of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. J. L. THOMAS,] who is interested in the question, I will, with the consent of the House, withdraw the bill and report and take some other occasion to submit them for action.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object, and move the bill and accompanying report be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed. Then we will have an opportunity to examine into the matter.

Mr. DELANO. I agree to that.

The motion was agreed to.

E. J. CURLEY.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee of Claims, reported back Senate bill No. 433, for the relief of E. J. Curley, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay or cause to be paid E. J. Curley, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $34,248 52, as compensation in full for corn purchased of him by Captain E. B. W. Reslicaux, assistant quartermaster on the part of the Government.

Mr. ROSS. I make the point of order that the bill makes an appropriation and must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. McKEE. I should like to inquire whether, this bill having once been in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and taken therefrom and referred to the Committee of Claims, the point of order is a good one?

The SPEAKER. It is an appropriation bill. Was it considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar at this Congress?

Mr. McKEE. At the last session it was taken from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar on my motion, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The rule is, the bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. It seems it went to that committee, but by unanimous consent was taken from that committee and referred to the Committee of Claims. It has not had a consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar provided for in the rule.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARGARETTE ANN LAURIE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, reported back Senate bill No. 441, for the relief of Margarette Ann Laurie, with the recommendation it do not pass; and it was accordingly laid upon the table.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, also moved that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the following cases, and that they do lie upon the table:

Petition of J. W. Nye, assignee of Peter Barge and Hugh Stewart; and Petition of George C. Hager, claiming payment for rent of blacksmith shop, &c.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The morning hour then expired.

MURDER OF UNITED STATES SOLDIERS.

Mr. PIKE. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the order to print documents accompanying the message of the President in reference to the murder of soldiers in South Carolina be rescinded. They are voluminous, and the committee will be delayed in its action. When the report is made, if necessary they can be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

Mr. KOONTZ, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill supplementary to joint resolution of June 28, 1864, incorporating the Young Men's Christian Association of the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

GEORGE D. DOUSMAN.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of George D. Dousman, one of the securities for William H. Bruce, late sub-Indian agent at Green Bay, in the State of Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (S. No. 151) appropriating money to defray the expenses of the joint select committee on retrenchment; when the Speaker signed the same.

OCEAN BRAZILIAN STEAMERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, in reply to a resolution of the House respecting the mail service performed by the ocean Brazilian steamers; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ROAD IN DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER also presented the memorial of the Legislature of Dakota Territory, praying for the establishment of a military road from Elk Point to Sioux Falls, in said Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KASSON. I move the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union on the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. DELANO. I move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The latter motion takes precedence.

Mr. DELANO. I will say to my friend that I will move that the committee rise at the expiration of an hour for the purpose of reaching his business.

Mr. KASSON. I dislike certainly to interfere with the Private Calendar, but the appropriation bill has been pending a long time, and I would like to get through with it.

Mr. DELANO. What I propose is that we spend an hour on the Private Calendar, and I propose to consider only such bills as there is no objection to.

Mr. KASSON. I suppose I ought to waive my motion in view of the fact that the day is assigned to private business, but I hope the gentleman will allow the appropriation bill to come in, if possible, a little earlier.

Mr. DELANO. I will, if possible.

Mr. KASSON. I then withdraw my motion.

Mr. DELANO. I ask that, by unanimous consent, to-day be considered as "objection day."

No objection being made it was so ordered.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. DELANO; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. BROOMALL in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of bills and joint resolutions on the Private Calendar as on "objection day;" which were disposed of as indicated below.

Those bills to which no objection was made were laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that they do pass; and such bills and resolutions as were objected to retained their place upon the Calendar.

HIRAM PAULDING.

A bill (H. R. No. 457) for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral United States Navy. The bill, which was read, directs the auditing of the accounts of Hiram Paulding while a captain in the United States Navy, covering his expenditures in the entertainment of the foreign officers and people who visited the frigate St. Lawrence, under his command, at Southampton, not exceeding the sum of $963 92; and also his expenditures in entertaining the officers of the Governments of Bremerhaven and Stockholm in the years 1848, 1849, and 1850, not exceeding the sum of $2,690.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the objection comes too late.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I believe I made it in time.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman rise from his seat?

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House.

CORPORATION OF WASHINGTON.

A bill (H. R. No. 710) to pay and discharge certain debts and expenditures to the corporation of the city of Washington.

Mr. DELANO. I think I must ask that this bill be laid over.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is understood as objecting.

TULLER AND FISHER.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 175) to audit and pay the claim of Tuller & Fisher, of Missouri. [Objected to by Mr. BENJAMIN.]

JOHN R. BECKLEY.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 174) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and pay the claim of John R. Beckley. [Objected to by Mr. ALLISON.]

HENRY S. DAVIS.

A bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of Henry S. Davis. [Objected to by Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois.]

JAMES POOL.

A bill (H. R. No. 811) for the relief of James Pool. [Objected to by Mr. ALLISON and Mr. ROSS.]

ALEXANDER F. PRATT.

An act (S. No. 435) for the relief of Alexander F. Pratt. [Objected to by Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois.]

JOSIAH O. ARMES.

An act (S. No. 16) for the relief of Josiah O. Armes. [Objected to by Mr. AMES.]

Mr. DELANO. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw his objection so as to allow me to move to refer this bill to the Committee of Claims. It has never been there.

Mr. WINDOM. I object.

SUFFERERS BY PORTLAND FIRE.

An act (S. No. 428) for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in Portland. [Objected to by Mr. McKEE.]

JOHN T. JONES.

A bill (S. No. 122) for the relief of John T. Jones, an Ottawa Indian, for depredations committed by white persons upon his property in Kansas Territory. [Objected to by Mr. THAYER.]

MRS. ABBY GREEN.

Joint resolution (S. No. 112) for the relief of Mrs. Abby Green. [Objected to by Mr. ALLISON.]

DONAHUE, RYAN AND SECOR.

A joint resolution (S. R. 141) for the relief of Donahue, Ryan & Secor, builders of the iron-clad monitor Camanche. [Objected to by Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask if there is not a report in that case?

The CHAIRMAN. There is none upon the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. Has the joint resolution ever been referred to a committee of this House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know.

Mr. MAYNARD. If it has not been and it is proper I will move to recommend that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the consideration of this joint resolution, and that it be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.

GEORGE W. LANE.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of George W. Lane, superintendent of the branch mint at Denver, Colorado, and Assistant Treasurer of the United States. [Objected to by Mr. ALLISON and Mr. COBB.]

BOLMER AND WEBER.

A bill (H. R. No. 821) for the relief of Bolmer & Weber, of St. Louis, Missouri. [Objected to by Mr. ALLISON and Mr. ANCONA.]

Mr. HOGAN. I hope the gentlemen will withdraw their objection.

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is there a report in this case? If there is I ask that it be read and there may then be no objection to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is objected to.

Mr. ANCONA. I desire to withdraw my objection to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] also objected.

Mr. SPALDING. I renew the objection.

TIMOTHY LEYDEN.

A bill (H. R. No. 822) for the relief of Timothy Leyden.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Timothy Leyden, of Parkersburg, West Virginia, (who was a teamster employed by Captain H. D. Patton, assistant quartermaster of volunteers, on the 1st day of May, 1864, at Martinsburg, and was captured on the 2d day of May following by the enemy, while with his team on duty near Winchester, and was imprisoned until the 15th day of December following, and was confined in hospital from diseases contracted in prison until the 2d day of March, 1865, and whose service was never paid nor reported to the Quartermaster General by said assistant quartermaster,) the sum of $302 in full for such service, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

JOHNSON A. DAWSON.

A bill (H. R. No. 823) for the relief of Johnson A. Dawson, of Mount Sterling, Kentucky.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, for the faithful service performed in time of war by Johnson A. Dawson, of Mount Sterling, Kentucky, contractor on mail route No. 9556, between Mount Sterling and Stanton, Kentucky, to pay to said Johnson A. Dawson the sum of $300 in full for all extra allowances for such service.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask that the report accompanying the bill be read.

The report was read. It states that the petitioner, on the 1st of July, 1862, contracted to carry the mail on horseback on route No. 9556, from Mount Sterling to Stanton, Kentucky, twenty-five miles, twice a week, for $186 per annum, or $1 78 per round trip of fifty miles. The petitioner executed his contract faithfully for the term of three years under the most discouraging circumstances. During the said term the prices of forage and subsistence advanced on the route at least one hundred per cent., rendering it doubly expensive for this humble contractor, whose only ambition seemed to be to gain a frugal livelihood by his personal service. The route was nearly abandoned as a thoroughfare of public travel, the roads in the winter season becoming nearly impassable and infested by rebel guerrillas and robbers, by whom petitioner was robbed of his clothing, arms, horse and equipment, but succeeded, however, in concealing the mail and in delivering it according to contract. It is in evidence that while he was frequently waylaid and attacked by rebels he pursued his route in the night-time if there was danger of being captured by day, and that the mail never failed. The petitioner, in view of his losses and sacrifices, asks an appropriation of $100 per annum additional to his contract price.

The committee have seriously considered the facts and circumstances presented in this memorial, and in view of his devotion to his country, and of the faithful services rendered, though in an humble capacity, under adverse and dangerous circumstances, by the petitioner, recommend the relief prayed for, and therefore report the accompanying bill.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

EDWARD BLANCHARD.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 824) for the adjustment of the claim of Edward Blanchard, executor of Captain Evan M. Buchanan.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the proper accounting officer to settle the account of Captain Evan M. Buchanan, and to allow a credit to his estate on said settlement, for money and vouchers taken from him at the time of his murder, not to exceed $400 36.

Mr. ROSS. I ask that the report accompanying the joint resolution be read.

The report was read. It states that on September 28, 1864, said Evan M. Buchanan, then on duty and duly commissioned a commissary of subsistence in the Army near Winchester, Virginia, was captured by the rebel guerrilla Mosby and brutally murdered after surrender; that at the time he had on his person money belonging to the Government and vouchers for money expended, amounting to $400 89, which was taken by the guerrillas. His administrator prays that said amount be credited to said Captain Buchanan on settlement of his account; and your committee deeming the claim just and proper therefore report back the accompanying joint resolution, and recommend its passage.

No objection being made, the joint resolution was laid aside to be reported to the House.

HENRY RUDD.

A bill (H. R. No. 825) for the relief of Henry Rudd, of Henry county, Iowa.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Henry Rudd, of Henry county, Iowa, the sum of $9,150 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full for all losses and compensation to said Henry Rudd for horses purchased and delivered under a contract with the Government.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read. It states that on the 3d of February, 1864, Captain James A. Ekin, chief quartermaster of the Cavalry Bureau and assistant quartermaster of the United States Army, on behalf of the United States, contracted in writing with petitioner for the delivery at Fort Des Moines, Iowa, to the United States Government, of five hundred head of cavalry horses, at an average price of $128 70 per head. Said horses were "to be sound in all particulars; not less than five nor more than nine years of age; from fifteen to sixteen hands high; bridle-wise, and of size sufficient for cavalry purposes; compactly built; in good flesh, and free from all defects." It was further agreed that said horses, upon delivery at the Government stables in Des Moines, should "be examined and inspected without unnecessary delay by a person or persons appointed by the United States; and after such inspector shall have certified that they are in all respects as contracted for, and fully equal to the specifications aforesaid, they shall be received and become the property of the United States; and all such horses as may be condemned and rejected by said inspector shall be removed from the Government stables within one day after the contractor had been notified of the rejection." It was further agreed that petitioner should be paid by the United States at the office of the quartermaster of the United States Army, at Washington city, District of Columbia, as follows: $124 for each and every horse of the first two hundred delivered; $128 dollars for each and every horse of the second two hundred delivered, and $129 50 for each and every horse of the last one hundred so delivered, making an average as above stated. This contract was executed in Washington, District of Columbia, about fifteen hundred miles from the place where it was to be fulfilled. The petitioner proceeded at once to Iowa, where he associated with himself J. P. Johnson and Robert Carter, of Henry county, Iowa, for the purchase and delivery of said horses, and for the more speedy and certain fulfillment of said contract. On the 17th of February following they had over two hundred and fifty head of the specified quality of horses at Fort Des Moines, Iowa, ready for delivery and inspection, but the Government had neither stables nor other means of receiving and disposing of said horses as specified in said contract, and the petitioner was compelled to keep them at an expense of fifty cents per head per day for forty days, or until the 28th of March following, when, for the first time the Government was prepared to receive and inspect them in pursuance of said contract. On the 5th of February, 1864, but two days following the execution of said contract, the Cavalry Bureau, by order of the Secretary of War, issued a circular of "instructions for inspectors of cavalry horses," prescribing rules and requirements for inspectors entirely different from and more stringent than those which prevailed at the time of the execution of said contract, many of which were in absolute conflict with its express terms. By these new instructions the senior inspector was required "to cause the horses furnished under each contract to be placed in the inspection yard at least twenty-four hours before inspecting them. Horses that are rejected for being under age, in poor condition, or temporarily injured by transportation or otherwise, shall be lightly branded on the front part of the fore hoof, near the coronet, with the letter 'R.' When horses are doubtful before branding they may be kept three or four days under guard, at the expense of the contractor, be again originally examined, and then finally disposed of in accordance with the foregoing rules. Horses will be fed at the expense of contractors till they have been branded and accepted."

The report further states that the committee find that the petitioner had no knowledge of these new instructions until they had presented the said two hundred and fifty head of horses for inspection on the 17th day of February, 1864. That so soon as he became aware of their nature and extent, and of the new terms thereby imposed upon his contract, he immediately proceeded to Washington and made application to the War Department, through Captain Ekin aforesaid, that said contract be annulled, and that he be released from the delivery of said horses; but Captain Ekin, on the part of the Government, utterly refused, reminding him that the Secretary of War had issued an order for the arrest and imprisonment of contractors refusing to comply with contracts, and at the same time assuring him that the rules would be changed, and that the Government would indemnify him for all losses sustained by a compliance with the contract. Hon. James Harlan, then United States Senator for the State of Iowa, was consulted with the officers of the Government on this occasion, and as the friend of the contractor, advised him to deliver the horses, as the Government was in much need of them, relying upon Congress for indemnity for his necessary and reasonable losses. This advice was likewise given by the Governor and adjutant general of the State of Iowa. Under these circumstances the petitioner and his said associates proceeded with the purchase and delivery of said horses and the fulfillment of said contract; but soon thereafter, and before the purchase of the remaining two hundred and fifty head, the Government, by its agents, entered directly into the open market for the purchase of horses, establishing depots for that purpose throughout the Northwest; raising the price paid for horses at these depots from $140 to $150 for cavalry horses, and as high as $160 for artillery horses. This change of price, on the part of the Government, prior to the time of the purchase and delivery of the horses under petitioner's contract, while it would seem to be a motive for annulling the contract, or for modifying or releasing the petitioner from the strict terms and provisions of the contract, raised the price of horses to the maximum throughout the Northwestern country, and particularly the State of Iowa, compelling the petitioner to purchase the remaining two hundred and fifty horses at those figures. For these untoward events no blame can attach to the petitioner. He complied with his contract, though at a considerable loss, resulting, it would appear, from the immediate action of the Government, which no protest could avert, and no forethought could provide against. The Government has paid him the contract price only of $126 70 per head, while the others it paid from $140 to $150 for the same quality of horses. The petitioner claims a loss of $17,000 under the contract, and there is reason to believe that it approximates to that amount; yet it appears that many of the items of this loss might be excluded in a judicial adjudication of the claim. The committee, in arriving at what to them appears an equitable allowance of the claim, are of opinion that, from the date of the "circular of instructions" to cavalry inspectors, the 5th of February, 1864, the said contract should be regarded as void, and that the petitioner should be released from its provisions; that the petitioner should be paid for the horses delivered on said contract an average price per head of that paid at the same time and in the vicinity by the Government to others for the like quality of horses. The committee find this average price to be $145 per head, and the amount that petitioner is justly entitled to should be the difference between the amount already paid him on the contract and the amount of five hundred head of horses at $145 per head, which is...$72,500. Deduct five hundred head at $126 70.. 63,350

Amount due petitioner..... $9,150

For which amount the committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. MAYNARD. It seems to me that this is a proper case to go before the Court of Claims. Would a motion to that effect be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I must object to the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will withdraw his objection until some explanation can be made of it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have no objection to hear any explanation that can be made.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] I believe is familiar with this case, having had charge of it in committee. I am satisfied that he can make such a statement as will lead the Committee of the Whole to allow this bill to be laid aside and reported to the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this case originated under a certain contract, or rather certain contracts, entered into by parties with the Government for the delivery of about eleven thousand horses by different parties. The larger part of the contractors, owing to a rule which was established by the Department after the contracts were entered into, refused to deliver the horses. This man came here from Iowa, and under the instruction of the quartermaster and of the Senator from his State, as well as of other parties, went on and delivered the horses in pursuance of his contract. The other contractors, upon an appeal to the Judge Advocate General, obtained a decision as to the point in controversy, releasing the binding force of the contracts. That decision is as follows:

"Where, after a contract for horses had been formally entered into, a circular was issued by the Cavalry Bureau requiring horses offered for inspection to be detained twenty-four hours at the expense of the owner, and then, if not accepted, to be branded 'R' for 'rejected'—held that this circular introduced new conditions, and conditions contrary to law, into the agreement; and as it was thereafter almost impossible to obtain the same supply of horses as before, practically prevented the performance of the agreement on the part of the contractor; that branding in the manner proposed by the new circular would have subjected those who engaged in it to an action at law; and that the Government could not force a contractor to deliver up his property to be subjected to a wrong."

The Committee of Claims found that out of the eleven thousand horses contracted for only six hundred were delivered—five hundred by the party here claiming compensation. He went on and executed his contract at a large expense to himself, relying upon the promises made here that he would be indemnified. He claims that he expended more money than this bill proposes to pay him. The committee inquired whether he had any other contract for horses, and found that this was the only contract in which he had ever engaged. He faithfully delivered the horses, fulfilling his contract in every particular. He furnished the horses below the market price, while the other contractors, refusing to carry out their original contracts, obtained high prices for the horses which they furnished.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, honest contractors were so very rare during the war that I believe I will make an exception of this case and withdraw my objection.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

NORMAN J. HALL.

A bill (H. R. No. 483) for the relief of Norman J. Hall.

The bill was read. It provides that in settling with the Treasury of the United States the accounts of Lieutenant Norman J. Hall, first United States artillery, acting assistant commissary of subsistence, and assistant quartermaster at Fort Sumter, South Carolina, there shall be allowed to Hall the sum of $965 72, on account of the loss of money and of vouchers for money paid, the amount being public funds and vouchers in his hands, destroyed by the blowing up of a magazine at Fort Sumter, South Carolina, during the bombardment of that fort by the rebels in the month of April, 1861; the loss being without neglect or fault on the part of Hall.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report. It states that the claimant was, in the month of April, 1861, first lieutenant of the first regiment United States artillery, stationed at Fort Sumter, in the harbor of Charleston, South Carolina, and was on duty at that fort by order of Major Robert Anderson, commanding there at the time of the bombardment and reduction of the same, as acting assistant quartermaster and commissary of subsistence of Major Anderson's command; that at the time and during the bombardment claimant had in his possession $774 02 public money of the United States, which he had previously drawn from the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at Charleston, by the direction of Hon. John A. Dix, then late Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and also vouchers for the expenditure of $191 70, as acting assistant commissary as aforesaid, which money and vouchers were placed and kept together in a box for that purpose in the fort, and which box, with money and vouchers, on the 12th or 13th of April, 1861, were destroyed or burnt up and wholly lost by the fire of the enemy and the explosion of a service magazine in said fort, without the fault or neglect of the claimant.

These facts, the committee state, are sufficiently established by the evidence of Major Generals Dix and Anderson, and, in the opinion of the committee, entitle the claimant to the relief sought for by the introduction of this bill.

The committee, therefore, recommend that the Secretary of the Treasury and the proper officers of that Department be directed to credit the claimant, in the settlement of his accounts, with the gross amount of $965 72, for public money and vouchers so lost and destroyed as aforesaid, and to this end recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

GOLDSMITH BROTHERS.

A bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Goldsmith Brothers, of the cities of San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon, brokers. [Objected to by Mr. MAYNARD.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. No. 156) to provide for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PURCHASE OF PROPERTY.

A bill (H. R. No. 666) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase certain property for military purpose. [Objected to by Mr. Ross and Mr. HENDERSON.]

ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY.

A bill (S. No. 290) to incorporate the National Life and Accident Insurance Company of the District of Columbia. [Objected to by Mr. WENTWORTH.]

Mr. KASSON moved that the committee rise and report the bills which were laid aside.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BROOMALL reported that the Committee of the Whole House, according to order, had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had directed him to report the following bills to the House, with the recommendation that they do pass:

A bill (H. R. No. 457) for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 822) for the relief of Timothy Leyden;

A bill (H. R. No. 823) for the relief of Johnson A. Dawson, of Mount Sterling, Kentucky;

A bill (H. R. No. 824) for the relief of Edward Blanchard;

A bill (H. R. No. 825) for the relief of Henry Rudd, of Henry county, Iowa; and

A bill (H. R. No. 483) for the relief of Norman Hall.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bills will be considered in gross.

There was no objection.

The bills were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS OF THE RULES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged question. The Committee on the Rules have directed me to report an amendment to the 51st Rule, merely for the purpose of facilitating the transaction of business on Mondays by curing the source of delay and trouble.

I move to amend the 51st Rule by striking out all that part of it which provides for a call of committees for bills, to be referred to the Committee of the Whole, during the morning hour on alternate Mondays; and amend the 130th Rule by providing that the States and Territories shall be called during the morning hour on every Monday, first for bills for leave to be referred without debate to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by a motion to reconsider; and that on said call joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures for printing and reference may be introduced.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am also directed by the Committee on the Rules to report a concurrent resolution looking to the establishment of a joint committee on public buildings and grounds. The matter was referred to the Committee on the Rules, and they have determined, in view of the great importance of such a committee in reference to the extension of the Capitol grounds, &c., it was best to make the committee a joint one.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses, namely:

RULE—There shall be a Joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to consist of five members on the part of the Senate and seven members on the part of the House, whose duty it shall be to consider all subjects relating to the public edifices and grounds within the city of Washington which may be referred to them, and report their opinion thereon together with such propositions relating thereto as may seem to them expedient.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. RAYMOND. I am directed by the Committee on the Rules, to which was referred the resolution in regard to the reports and reporters of the Associated Press, to report the following:

Resolved, That the reporters of the Associated Press and the reports made by them be under the same rules and regulations as the reporters and reports of the Globe.

Mr. ROSS. Does that require them to take an oath? I understand the reporters of the Globe take an oath.

The SPEAKER. The reporters of the Globe do not take an oath. They may elsewhere; they do not here. [Great laughter.]

Mr. UPSON. Is the compensation to be the same?

The SPEAKER. It is not; that is a matter of law.

The resolution was adopted.

EXTRA COMPENSATION TO CLERKS.

Mr. HILL. The Speaker yesterday laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House, information concerning the disbursement of the fund of $250,000 and $160,000 as extra compensation to clerks in his Department, which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means and ordered to be printed. I move, by unanimous consent, that reference be changed to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

There was no objection, and it was agreed to accordingly.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KASSON moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

Mr. KASSON. Before taking up the pending question, I ask unanimous consent to correct a few errors that have been discovered on a reexamination of the bill. The first is on page 7, line one hundred and forty-three. I propose to reduce the amount from $873 to $240.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. The next amendment is on page 8, line one hundred and seventy-two, to strike out $12,658 for laborers and insert $12,158; also to add the following:

For Lewis Sanders, laborer in charge of the House water-closet $538, at which sum the salary of the said laborer is fixed, and $100 additional for a deficiency in the present fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move further to amend the bill on page 22, line five hundred and eighteen, by striking out the word "Nebraska," and reducing the appropriation from $8,300 to $7,000, so that the clause will read "For compensation of the surveyor general of Kansas, and the clerks in his office, $7,000." Also by adding the following:

For compensation of the surveyor general of Iowa and Nebraska, declared a surveying district by the act of Congress, entitled "An act to remove the office of surveyor general of the States of Iowa and Wisconsin to Plattsmouth in Nebraska," approved July 28, 1866, which is fixed at $2,000 per annum, and the clerks in his office, $7,000.

This amendment is rendered necessary by an act of the last session changing the surveying districts so that Iowa and Nebraska now constitute one district, and Kansas another and separate district.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. It is also necessary to strike out the word "Nebraska" in line five hundred and fifty-one, and after line five hundred and fifty-two to insert as follows:

For office rent of surveyor general of Iowa and Nebraska, fuel, books, stationery, and other incidental expenses, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move further to amend on page 28, line six hundred and seventy-seven, by so changing the clause as to read as follows:

For compensation of the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, the civil engineer, chief clerk, messenger, laborers, and the following clerks and draughtsmen which are hereafter authorized, namely: one clerk of class four, two clerks of class three, one clerk of class two, one clerk of class one, and one draughtsman at a salary of $1,800 per annum, $16,640.

This involves no change at all, except by adding a draughtsman at the salary provided for in the other bureaus of the Navy Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move further to amend on page 29, in line six hundred and eighty-nine, by changing the clause so as to read as follows:

For compensation of the chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, and chief clerks, clerks, draughtsman, (whose salary is hereby established at $1,800 per annum,) messenger, and laborers in his office, $16,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move further to amend by inserting in line six hundred and ninety-four, after the word "draughtsman," the words "whose salary is hereby increased to $1,800 per annum;" and also, by striking out the words "increase of salary of the draughtsman, $400."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move further to amend by inserting in line six hundred and ninety-eight, after the word "draughtsman," the same words as before, namely, "whose salary is hereby established at $1,800 per annum," and by striking out the words "increase of salary of the draughtsman, $400;" also, by changing the amount appropriated from $11,820 to $11,220, and by inserting before the word "clerk" the words "and of," and after the word "two" the words "which is hereby authorized." The clause will then read as follows:

For compensation of the chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, chief clerk, and the clerks, draughtsman, (whose salary is hereby increased to $1,800 per annum,) messenger, and laborer in his office, $11,820; and of one clerk of class two, which is hereby authorized, $1,400.

Mr. KASSON. In line seven hundred and fifty-two I move to insert, after the word "topographer," the words "three chief clerks." The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. We have now reached the point in the bill where the committee paused when they were last in session.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 33, line seven hundred and eighty-six, strike out "eighty" and insert "forty-five;" so that it will read:

For purchase of cereal, vegetable, and flower seeds, and for labor in putting up seed, seed-bags, and miscellaneous items, $45,000.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, when this question was up before, I made some comments in relation to the conduct of the office of the Commissioner on Agriculture, and in the course of my remarks I stated that the cost of the printing of the monthly periodical amounted to a large sum, and I made the statement, perhaps, in rather a sweeping manner. I did not know at that time how much it did amount to, nor do I now. Since that time I have, however, made inquiries, and I find that the Commissioner claims that the printing does not cost over $10,000. I am persuaded that he is mistaken, for the late Superintendent of the Public Printing Office told me it might reach for printing, paper, folding, &c., forty or fifty thousand dollars.

I have no personal hostility against this learned and distinguished officer. He is I believe a very amiable gentleman. I am actuated only by a desire to have this bureau continued and managed with such success that the country shall approve of it.

Now, since this gentleman has held this office I think there have been $500,000 appropriated, which he has expended, and what has he to show for it? I admit that the annual reports are among the best we have ever had, but they are bought and paid for at the rate of five dollars a page, as I understand. He also has among his subordinates some very competent men. I give him credit for zeal and enthusiasm in his position; but I think the place might be better filled. And, sir, beside this $500,000 already alluded to, and beside the cost of printing this monthly periodical, there is the whole cost of printing the annual reports and various other documents. They are bound, too, at the public expense, and some of them, rather expensively bound and distributed.

But, Mr. Chairman, I alluded also to the fact that the business of this office has not been conducted always with the highest order or system, and that has been proven by the fact that he has sometimes, after spending all we appropriated, called for appropriations to meet large deficiencies. When we appropriate a certain sum for a certain purpose, if I am not misinformed, he expends it either for that purpose or for any other which he sees fit. For instance, we appropriated for the propagating garden $10,800, and he is reported to have expended $12,000. We appropriated for contingencies $3,500, and I am led to believe that he spent under that head $6,650. We appropriated for seeds and cost of putting them up, &c., $54,000, and he expended $66,000; so I have been told. He buys most of the seeds in Philadelphia at second-hand, though some are his own importations, at an expense of about twenty-eight thousand dollars, and then, if I am correctly informed—and if not the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture will correct me—for putting up those same seeds he expended over forty-four thousand dollars, when they would have been put up in any respectable seed-store probably for half the money.

This distinguished gentleman is in the receipt of a salary of $3,000. He has one son, entirely worthy so far as I know, who is in the receipt of a salary of $2,000, and another who has a salary of $1,600. He has one nephew who has a salary of $1,400, and another who has a salary of $1,000. These may all be excellent officers for aught I know; but besides this, he owns a horse—an excellent horse very likely—which the Government has to support, and a carriage which is said to be used exclusively for his own benefit, and for which the Government has been charged within the last three years the sum of $3,000—the Government being charged one dollar a day for the use and twenty-five dollars a month for the keep of his horse. I do not charge any corruption; it may be all proper; but I think it shows enough of the Yankee in the Quaker to take care of his own. Beside all this, he has seven rooms in the Patent Office building, and in addition to that hires two or three rooms outside—paying $600 and $1,200 rental—one of which I believe is used on Sundays for a church, and I have been informed the chairs or the fixtures of that church are supplied by the Government. I do not find fault with this. It may be a proper charity if the permission of Congress has not been asked.

But, Mr. Chairman, I only rose to call the attention of the House to the propriety of reducing the appropriation as proposed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BIDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel at liberty to go into a general explanation in regard to the condition of the Agricultural Department, for the reason that that subject was submitted to the Committee on Agriculture for investigation and they have not yet reported. A large amount of testimony was taken by that committee and a great number of facts were proved, sufficient to induce this House, could they be related here, to reorganize the Department and put it upon a foundation which would be creditable to the nation.

But, sir, I rose for the purpose of saying that I believe it to be bad policy to reduce this appropriation. While the means that we have now for acquiring useful agricultural information and diffusing the same among the people of the United States are not such as we would wish them to be, yet until we can rearrange and reorganize this Department it seems to me that we ought not to attempt to destroy it. There is no other source of the prosperity of this country so important as that of agriculture. It should be fostered by every means within the power of this Government.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. BIDWELL] whether the investigations to which he has alluded, and which have continued during nearly all of this Congress, enable him to make any reply to the statements made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL?]

Mr. BIDWELL. I will state that after the testimony was taken, I, as chairman of the committee, was exceedingly anxious to lay that information before the House. But the majority of the committee did not concur with the chairman; and consequently the chairman did not feel at liberty to bring that information before the House. I would state, however, that I believe such is now the disposition of the Committee on Agriculture, so far as I have been able to ascertain it, that they will be able to agree upon a bill by the time the committee is called, which will provide for the reorganization of that bureau so as to place it upon a better foundation.

Now, I am aware, that the law under which that bureau is organized is complied with literally by the Commissioner on Agriculture. He is required by that law to report the amount of receipts and expenditures, and he makes his report annually; one year I believe it was contained within sixteen lines; another year it was comprised within seven or eight lines, and this year I believe it is all embraced within two or three lines, as so many dollars received and so many dollars expended. As for the particulars, you have to wade through a multiplicity of vouchers, which would require an expert almost a month to decipher. I hope, therefore, that no further explanation will be required of me, unless I, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, be authorized to report the result of the investigations made by the committee at the last session.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. BIDWELL] allow me to ask him whether or not the facts stated by me are corroborated by the facts ascertained by the committee?

Mr. BIDWELL. I will state that they are not only corroborated, but I believe the testimony shows that they are even worse than the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has stated.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand the gentleman to say that my statements are not only corroborated, but that the testimony shows the facts to be even worse than I have stated.

Mr. BIDWELL. I merely give that as my opinion of what the testimony proves.

Mr. DELANO. I move to amend by striking out the last word, for the purpose of saying a few words. I would like to ask the Chair, in the first place, whether it would be in order for me to move to strike out the entire appropriation for the Agricultural Bureau?

Mr. KASSON. Before the Chair decides that question, I would suggest that the Committee of the Whole has already passed upon a portion of the appropriations here recommended. Now, I apprehend that it is not in order to move to strike out anything which this committee has adopted. That is the point I submit to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order to move to strike out the paragraph now under consideration.

Mr. DELANO. Then I make that motion instead of the one I first made. I wish to say in advance that I am not to be understood as opposed to the Agricultural Bureau. If there is any interest in this nation which deserves more attention and care from the General Government than it has yet received, in my opinion it is this very agricultural interest. But while we have at the head of this great interest, upon which the prosperity of the nation rests, and which is the foundation of our income and our resources, while this great interest is intrusted to the hands of a man who I consider utterly and entirely incompetent for the place, I but speak the sense of the agricultural interests of the country when I say they would prefer that no appropriation whatever should be made for the support of this Agricultural Bureau.

I believe there is not in the Union a State agricultural society that has not asked for, solicited, and demanded the removal of the man who is now at the head of the Agricultural Bureau. Our horticultural societies have united in this request: all the societies connected with this great interest demand his removal. But he seems to be fixed there. I do not know what adhesive power holds him there; whether or not it is by supplying his friends with little articles of convenience and comfort that do not come to the public eye or do not reach the public palate, is more than I can say. He seems, so to say, to be frozen to the man who holds his appointment in his hands. There is apparently no persuasion, no inducement that we can bring to bear which can accomplish the removal of this man from his present position.

It is time the agricultural interest of the country should be heard. Why, sir, it is not long since I, in company with a Senator, called upon the Executive to see whether it was not possible to remove this man and put a competent officer in his place, in compliance with the wishes of the agricultural interest. I was met with the pathetic inquiry, "What shall be done with Father Newton?" In God's name, if it be necessary, pension him; give him a permanent pension corresponding in amount with the salary he now receives; take the money, if necessary, out of the agricultural fund; for this would be more advantageous for the agricultural interest than to continue the administration of the present Commissioner.

I am in earnest in this matter; and I say, until we can have at the head of the Department of Agriculture a man competent for the position, so that it may be administered as the interests of the country demand, let us have no appropriation whatever for the support of this Department, and then perhaps we shall have some relief.

I could go further into this matter were we not limited in debate by the five-minute rule. I will only say in conclusion that my present motion has not been made simply to enable me to make these observations. I hope the committee will strike out the whole of the appropriation.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to enter into the general debate upon the subject of the administration of the Agricultural Department. I have made such representations as it was proper for me to make in the consideration of this question in committee. Here I represent the action of the committee, and have only to say that if this Department is to be continued the majority of the committee decided in favor of these several amounts of appropriation for the objects named.

I apprehend that as a matter of order the motion of the gentleman from Ohio can only be put in the first instance as to the paragraph under consideration; and then, of course, it may be renewed, if the gentleman chooses, as to each succeeding paragraph. The question practically presented to the House is therefore whether we shall make these appropriations and rely upon a report from the Committee on Agriculture to reorganize that Department, and by legislation, if not otherwise, remove the present head of the Department, if that be the will of the House; or whether we shall strike out only this part of the appropriation, leaving a mere skeleton bill for the conduct of the business of that Department. My own conception of the duty of the committee is that, if it be their will to change the administration of this Department and reorganize it, thus carrying out the object which the gentleman from Ohio has in view, this reorganization should be provided for in a new bill. We certainly should not pass this appropriation bill without providing the means of carrying on that Department in case the present incumbent should be displaced and a successor appointed. I leave the matter entirely in the hands of the committee, only asking that such legislation may be adopted as will not put an end to the existence of the Agricultural Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. DELANO. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BERGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. It appears to me, sir, that if it is the intention of this House to continue the Department of Agriculture, it is necessary to vote the appropriations as reported by the committee. I think that the agricultural interests of this country demand that this Department should be continued and the necessary appropriations provided.

One word, sir, as to the statement made by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in relation to the expenses of that Department. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture I was present during the whole of the investigation which has been referred to, and as I understand the matter the gentleman from Vermont is mistaken in the conclusion to which he has arrived. I differ on this point with the chairman of the committee, and, as I understand, the majority of the committee also differ with him. The charges made in reference to the administration of the Department of Agriculture were not, I think, sustained to the extent which the gentleman from Vermont has stated.

I do not desire to go into particulars with reference to the proceedings in the committee; it may be improper to do so. I may state, however, that the committee were divided in opinion. My understanding with reference to the charges made and the extent to which they were sustained differs from that expressed by the chairman of the committee, although I simply give my own view of the matter. I hope that the appropriations for this Department will be by all means continued; and if it is necessary to reorganize the Department, as appears to be the opinion of the chairman and others, that is a matter for future consideration.

I do not pretend to say the Department might not be reorganized and placed under better regulations than it is at present; but that is a matter for future consideration. I hope, under the circumstances, in view of the importance of agriculture in this country, that the appropriations as reported by the committee will be sustained by the House.

Mr. BROMWELL. I do not understand the condition of the amendment, and I ask that it be again read.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment to the amendment, striking out $45,000 and inserting $5,000.

It does seem to me, sir, it is about time the country got rid of this thing called an Agricultural Bureau, if it is to be carried on forever in the manner which we have seen. For the last two years there have been complaints, and no man who has put his foot into this city, or has been anywhere else in the United States, but has heard complaints of the management of that so-called bureau.

Mr. HILL. We have heard a great many complaints about the conduct of the Agricultural Bureau. What I desire, and what I presume the committee desires, are the facts. What is the trouble with Mr. Newton? Let the gentleman specify.

Mr. BROMWELL. If the gentleman will not interrupt me I will speak of the common reputation of that bureau in the country; and that its reputation is bad facts are not wanting I apprehend to prove.

But I did not rise for the purpose of discussing every particular dereliction on the part of that bureau. We know that almost every agricultural, horticultural, and pomological society in the Union has called upon the Government to reform that bureau and to place another man in charge of it. Yet we are to be told that the valuable pictures and writings published once a year by that bureau are so essential to the agriculture of the country it must be carried on, although it be, as intimated by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] the seat of corruption, and thoughts total inefficiency is notorious throughout the country. I should like to know why this Government might not as well subscribe to some agricultural newspaper, whose volume at the end of the year would contain more pictures and have a greater number of articles, as well written, which would be quite as instructive as those of the Agricultural Bureau?

Look at the seed purchased. Could we not purchase that seed, new seed of any kind or variety, in Philadelphia, New York, or other city through an agent as well as this bureau of the Government. Of course, with the gentleman from Ohio I regard the Agricultural Bureau as one of the institutions of the country which ought to be maintained. But, sir, it ought to be maintained with some efficiency. It ought not to be the laughing-stock of the country. It ought to be something which can benefit the agricultural interest and be of profit to the people of the country by providing them with new and valuable seeds and with useful information at a reasonable expense to the Government. But what do we have? Every member of Congress gets about once in three months some kind of seed, which can be purchased in every grocery or seed-store from the Atlantic to the Pacific at five cents a paper. The whole thing would not amount to more than three or four dollars if bought in a seed-store. At the same time about once or twice in the year each member of Congress gets a handful of flower seeds. All these, so far as I have noticed, are for sale by the gardeners and at the seed-stores. What does it all amount to? We get a volume a year written in that Department not so good as the American Agriculturist or the Prairie Farmer, which can be furnished, I believe, at $1 50 a year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Chairman, without finding unnecessary fault with any of the members of the House who see proper to attack the head of the Agricultural Department, I may be allowed to call upon those gentlemen at least for some specifications in their wholesale charges. It is admitted by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] that he has given the country better agricultural reports than any of his predecessors. Wherein does the head of the present bureau fall short of any former head of that Department?

Mr. COOK. What has my colleague to say about the charges made by the gentleman from Vermont, which were admitted to be true by the gentleman from California?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have this to say: that it is admitted that the head of this Department is as capable and as honest as any man who has heretofore had charge of it, and gives the country as much information beneficial to the agricultural interest, and moreover I do not understand that it is admitted that the Commissioner of Agriculture has been guilty of maladministration of his office; at any rate do not condemn him without a hearing.

Mr. Chairman, the agriculturists of the West and of the East and of all parts of the country feel a deep interest in the maintenance of the Agricultural Department if they have no interest in the distribution of seeds. And my colleague and many other members will bear me testimony that they have more applications for the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture than for all other public documents put together; and I have no doubt that the Government is more amply compensated for this outlay to promote and foster the agricultural interest than in the expenditure of an equal amount in any other direction.

Mr. GRINNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. INGERSOLL. For a question.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish to inquire whether if you cut down this appropriation for seeds you may not with propriety do the same in relation to the publishing of the reports.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman is quite right. I am speaking against the tendency of these assaults. If you cut down the appropriation in this particular where will you stop? probably not till you have deprived the agriculturists of the country of the benefits of this Department altogether. This is what I want to enter my protest against. Some gentlemen seem to consider it very agreeable and pleasant pastime to assail the kind-hearted old Quaker who is at the head of this bureau, thinking, perhaps, that there is no one who takes interest enough in him to defend him.

A MEMBER. He is a non-resistant, I believe.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I believe the Quakers hold to the doctrine of non-resistance in their creed. But let that pass. I protest against this proposed reduction of the appropriation. This bureau is in successful operation, and if the head of it has not the capacity and intellect of some gentlemen on this floor he certainly has able assistants, who have given the country the best report that has ever been published by that Department; and he has distributed a great variety of choice and rare seeds throughout the breadth of the land. Indeed, I am told that some members owe much of their popularity at home to the fact that they have been very assiduous in distributing the flower seeds. [Laughter.] If that is so, I am against depriving them of this aid by which they may be returned to the Forty-First Congress. [Laughter.]

Now, I hope my colleague, who preceded me, and members from the West generally, will not persist in cutting down this appropriation. Better abolish the Department altogether than make a trifling appropriation that will but maintain its existence in name only, and leave it utterly inadequate to the wants and demands of this greatest of all interests.

Mr. KASSON. I ask leave simply to say that very much time has been spent on this one clause of the bill, and I think the whole subject has been pretty thoroughly ventilated. I therefore hope, by general consent, debate will be closed in five minutes on this clause.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, debate on this paragraph will be closed in five minutes.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. KASSON. I then move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing the debate on this paragraph.

Mr. DELANO. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion to allow me to submit an amendment in the form of a proviso at the close.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not be in order now.

Mr. KASSON. I will withdraw the motion for the present, and allow the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] to speak on the subject.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move to amend by increasing the amount to $75,000, and I do it in good faith. I do believe that we ought to keep alive that branch of the Government. I do not know how other gentlemen feel about this matter or how their constituents feel, but I do know that in my region of country we have derived great benefit from this source in more ways than one. Gentlemen who do not live in agricultural districts—gentlemen from Massachusetts or Connecticut, where the mass of the people are engaged in other pursuits—do not conceive the necessity or utility of this Department; but I know that the agricultural interest of my region has through this channel introduced a quality of wheat adapted to that particular locality, by the use of which they have been enabled to raise crops that could not otherwise have been grown; for it is well understood by agriculturists that the same kind of wheat grown for a series of years in a particular region is very apt to run out, but by constant change you can keep up the production.

Now, sir, I protest against the system of legislation that is proposed here. My colleague after declaring his devotion to the agricultural interest of the country makes a proposition here that must strike down that Department at once, if his motion prevails. Sir, he will find it difficult to satisfy the agriculturists of Ohio that he is in favor of that interest if his motion prevails. Now, sir, the gentleman who fills this office, if I recollect aright, was appointed by Mr. Lincoln during his first term and he has been continued in it ever since. If he is not a fit person for the place, I ask gentlemen here to adopt such legislation as will produce the desired result. If not, let us make this appropriation and hold the executive department of the Government responsible for putting a proper man in this place. That is the proper course for us to pursue, and not to deny an appropriation, which if denied must destroy this branch of the service entirely. I appeal to gentlemen to make a proper appropriation for this bureau. If the man who administers its affairs is an unfit man for the place let us appeal to the proper authority in order to have him removed and another man put in his place who will administer this Department in a proper and fitting way. That seems to me to be the true course for us to pursue. I hope this appropriation will not be denied and the Agricultural Department thereby destroyed. Sir, we are spending money in various ways that do not result in any good whatever to the people. This Department, to say the least, promises some good to the people, and as long as it promises good let us foster it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of speaking to the amendment and in response to my friend and colleague, [Mr. LE BLOND.] I am from an agricultural district, and I yield to no gentleman upon this floor in regard to the appreciation that I have of the importance of an Agricultural Bureau or Department of the Government, and I have hoped to see that Department become of so much importance that its head might be invited to the councils of the President of the nation. I do not know that that is likely to happen under the administration of the present incumbent. I believe he once sought an entrance into the Cabinet. [Laughter.] But what is really the question now presented? My colleague [Mr. DELANO] does not present it distinctly to the House. A proposition is made to reduce the appropriation for this bureau, on at least one of the items involved, a large sum. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has presented certain facts to this House showing extravagant and unauthorized expenditures by this head of the Agricultural Department. He appealed to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture to know whether he had overstated those facts, and the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. BIDWELL] says that he has not overstated them, but that as far as the investigation in which his committee has been engaged elicits the truth the case is much more monstrous even than that represented by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Now, sir, in connection with this I may allude to the fact that there has been an investigation, proceeding under instructions given by the House to the Committee on Agriculture, into the administration of this Department; and to show what obstructions have been thrown in the way of that investigation by the head of this Department, we have laid upon our tables a statement over the signature of Mr. Gendell, who seems to have been one of the clerks in the bureau, in relation to the manner in which witnesses before the committee have been treated—clerks in the Department who have been called upon to testify before the committee—and that is a sufficient reason for taking away this appropriation from under the control of this man if this statement be true. I know nothing personally of it. It appears that two or three clerks in this bureau, who were called upon to testify as to the manner of administering the affairs of the office, and through whose developments some of these extravagant and unauthorized expenditures have been revealed, have been turned out of office for daring to go before a committee of Congress and tell the truth in regard to the head of their bureau. You may consider this matter in what light you choose, but by the general consent, not only of this House, but of the country, this man, however kind and amiable he may be in the other relations of life, is unfit to be at the head of that which ought to be an important branch of the Government. He is incompetent and is denounced as such by the agricultural interest and those who represent that interest all over the country, and this seems to be the only way in which Congress can reach him.

My colleague [Mr. LE BLOND] suggests that the proper way is to apply to the appointing power and have him removed. Sir, we have no influence with the appointing power. While this man was continued in office, under Mr. Lincoln's Administration, I know the political friends of Mr. Lincoln in great numbers called upon and remonstrated with him for permitting this man to longer remain in that place; and there was a continual expectation up to the very time of the death of Mr. Lincoln that the removal would take place. But now it is my colleague, [Mr. LE BLOND], if he has not altogether repudiated his connection with Andrew Johnson, who would have the influence necessary to bring about this change. We as a Congress, treated as we are by the President, and having so little influence with the President, can do nothing but control the supplies and cut off "the bread and butter" of this man.

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not think I would have any more influence with Mr. Johnson than my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] and his associates had with Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. SPALDING. Does the gentleman allude to me when he speaks of his colleague having influence with the President?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not; I referred to my other colleague on that side of the House, [Mr. LE BLOND.]

Mr. SPALDING. If the gentleman referred to me, I was going to say that I understand Mr. Kennedy, once at the head of the Census Bureau, is likely to be now appointed in place of Mr. Newton.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not think that would be any improvement.

Mr. SPALDING. I agree with the gentleman in that opinion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope no such change as that will be made. What should be done is to put at the head of that bureau a scientific man, who would make it what it ought to be, and not give us through the instrumentality of others merely such reports as can be obtained from the papers and elsewhere. We ought to have there a man who would so conduct the affairs of the bureau in all its relations at home and abroad as to show himself fit to act as one of the advisers of the President.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LE BLOND. I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move to amend by striking out the word "five." I do so for the purpose of saying a few words in reference to what has been said here about the investigation before the Committee on Agriculture in regard to the conduct of the present Commissioner of Agriculture. Charges have been made here to-day by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL], the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who appealed to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. BIDWELL] to state whether those charges were not substantiated by the testimony before the committee. Now, I desire to say, as the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, that he was in a very decided minority upon that committee in the opinion which he expressed before this House; I think he was in a minority of one on that committee in that respect. Those charges were considered by the entire committee, with the exception of its chairman, as entirely unsubstantiated by the proof submitted to the committee.

And I desire to say further to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], who has just spoken, that in my opinion, and, I believe, in the opinion of the Committee on Agriculture, those charges were manufactured and trumped up by men who had been turned out of that Department in order to produce the very result which he says he would deprecate; that is, the appointment of the other gentleman who has been named here, the late Commissioner of the census, to the position of head of the Bureau of Agriculture. I believe all the members of the Committee on Agriculture, with the exception of the chairman, [Mr. BIDWELL], and possibly one other member of the committee, were convinced that those charges were unsubstantiated, that they were malicious and unfounded, and were instigated by feelings of disappointment on account of being removed from office, and perhaps from a hope that they would result in the change indicated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

So much in regard to these charges. If gentlemen desire to bring this matter before the House, I call upon them now to bring forward their facts, and not merely refer to the various rumors which have been trumped up and published all over the country in order to influence public opinion. It was in evidence before the committee that the societies to which my friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has referred were influenced by emanations sent out from this city, with the expectation and with the request that these charges should be brought forward by them. In relation to the little pamphlet from which the gentleman has read, I do not recollect that the man whose name is attached to it, was before the committee, or, if he was, what the nature of his testimony was; nor do I know anything about his having been removed from office.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to listen to a single statement made by this person who signs himself "W. B. Gendell," (of whom I never heard before,) and then to state what he [Mr. TROWBRIDGE] knows of the transactions there referred to. This gentleman addresses himself to Congress, and says:

"When the committee appointed by Congress were taking testimony in relation to the management, &c., of the Agricultural Department, a number of the employees in that Department were summoned as witnesses. The records of the committee will show that but two of these witnesses gave clear and direct testimony; the others hesitated and equivocated, and gave only such testimony as was forced from them by direct questions. The testimony given by myself and the other witness is unimpeached and unimpeachable, and the facts detailed by us have been fully established."

"For thus being compelled to testify against the Commissioner, and acting up to the spirit and meaning of our oath to 'tell the truth and the whole truth,' we were immediately dismissed from office."

Does the gentleman know whether that is true or not? Did there appear before the committee, clerks who have since been dismissed?

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I do not know with regard to the dismissal. It was in last February that we took this testimony. I do not recollect this man by name; but I give an emphatic denial to the statement he has made in that paper, that the clerks in the Department hesitated or equivocated or in any way seemed to be influenced or controlled by the Commissioner of Agriculture, or by what they expected would be done to them by him. On the contrary, the employees of that Department testified before us fairly and frankly, without any hesitation. No man appeared in his answers to be under any improper influence or constraint.

Mr. BOSS. Mr. Chairman, representing, as I do, the best agricultural district in the United States, and this being a question in which my constituents naturally feel an interest, I deem it proper to say a word or two upon the question. In my judgment, those gentlemen in this House who desire to be considered as the friends of the agriculturists of the country will commit a great error if they suffer themselves to be drawn into the net set by some members who are opposed to the Department of Agriculture, and who now propose to cut down the ordinary appropriations for that Department. This proposition is urged upon the ground that there are objections to the head of the Department. But is this the proper and legitimate method of remedying the evil, if there be an evil? I think, Mr. Chairman, it clearly is not. We should continue the appropriations necessary for the continued support of this Department, and if there are well-grounded objections to the present incumbent we should make efforts to oust him, not by legislation, but by application to the proper appointing power, who will no doubt hear and properly consider any application on the subject.

I know that during the last session of Congress various individuals were proposed as proper persons to fill this position. I was called upon myself by several persons to sign applications for them. But I did not find that there was any man who towered so eminently above the others as to justify any interference in his behalf. I desired that when we should make a change it should be recognized by everybody as an improvement. My judgment is that whenever a suitable individual shall be presented there is no consideration which will prevent us from all uniting our influence and placing at the head of that Department a competent officer, capable of discharging the duties, if the present incumbent is incompetent. I am not prepared to say that Mr. Newton is the most competent man in the United States to hold the position he now occupies; perhaps an improvement might be made; and whenever a man with suitable qualifications for so important a position shall be presented I will cheerfully give my assent to his appointment.

But it is said that a great many of the agricultural products sent out by this Department are not of much value to the people. Suppose we admit this to be the fact, are we therefore to sweep out of existence this important Department, in which the agriculturists of the country are so deeply interested? Why, sir, we can regulate by law the distribution of these agricultural products; we can define with precision the duties of the Commissioner; we can specify what sort of fruits and plants and seeds are to be distributed by the Department of Agriculture, and thus obviate the difficulty of which gentlemen complain.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] has alluded to a single article of great value which has been distributed by this Department. And during the last session of Congress I was informed by a Senator of a fact, of which I was not before aware, that the valuable article of white wheat, which is now cultivated extensively in this country, and the flour from which commands two dollars more per barrel than any other flour, was first sent out from the Agricultural Bureau of the Patent Office.

Well, if that is true that single article of wheat distributed throughout the country in itself is worth more to the farmers than the entire expense of the Agricultural Bureau from the time of its inception down to the present time. I am told that other articles in the same way are introduced into the country. Are we to be guilty of the folly of striking down this valuable Department of the Government, in which the agriculturists are so deeply interested, because we do not happen to like the individual who occupies the highest position in the Department? I hope such will not be the case.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I have always felt a great interest in this Department of Agriculture. I know its whole history. I was here when it was first established, and I have franked off a great many of its seeds, and they have done a great deal of good. I go further, and say that, in my opinion, the gentleman they have now at the head of the Department is the best qualified for the office of any who ever did hold the place. I say they have heretofore generally been professed politicians or attorneys-at-law. I understand that the present one is a practical farmer, and knows something about agriculture, a great deal about agriculture. But he labors under some disadvantage. That disadvantage arises, in my opinion, from the law itself. I think the whole Department needs reorganization. Every one who follows the present head under existing laws will give rise to the same difficulties.

It is said his reports are bad, and that he is disqualified for the position. Look at his report. Only eleven pages are his own, while the rest is by the most distinguished writers of the country. If these writings had not gone into this report they would have gone into some agricultural paper, and would not have had half the circulation and most of the people would have been deprived of the information.

Before coming here I received a circular from the Agricultural Department asking me to write something for the report, and stating how much I would be allowed per page, but at the time I was engaged in a political contest and could not comply with the request. When I leave the scenes of public life here, and like Cincinnatus, retire to my farm, when I go back to the prairies of Illinois and cultivate my farm for a living, I may be induced to write for the agricultural report instead of writing for some agricultural newspaper where I would not get one half the pay and not one tenth of the circulation. [Laughter.]

Some complaints are made about the pictures in this report. It is not the fault of the Commissioner if they are not better, because he invites them from all parts of the country. I think there are better animals in the United States. But send him the pictures and he will put them into the report. I have an artist in view of my retiring to my farm to take the picture of my own animals, and it will be a matter of pleasure for me in private life to know that my colleagues in this House will be franking off pictures of my animals to their constituents. [Laughter.]

Here Mr. CULLOM took the chair.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have left the chair in order to say a word in defense of a friend. I want to corroborate what has been said by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. TROWBRIDGE.] I wish I had time to speak at length on this subject, but I have not.

I have seen manifested in this House to-day what I consider a most illiberal and unjust spirit toward this Department. You have appropriated for the Secretary of the Treasury more than a million dollars, and not a word of inquiry was made on the subject. You have made appropriations for other Departments, and you propose to pass the bill without making any question on the subject. But when you come to the Department of Agriculture, which, as my friend says, is one of the best in the country, it seems every lawyer on the floor and every professional man claims the privilege of abusing the head of that Department without making any charges. I venture to say, if the investigation we made last winter is spread before the House, there is not an honest man, except the chairman of the committee, but will condemn the charges brought by men like the one whose pamphlet has been read.

One man stood before the committee, as my friend knows, and swore that the imported wheat was filled with various impurities; but when it was exhibited to the committee it was as clean as any you ever saw. That man was said to be crazy and was turned out, not on account of the testimony he gave before the committee, but because he was mentally unfit for the position. In the committee-room he stated what was not true, yet he was turned out because he was considered to be insane, demented.

That is the kind of testimony upon which you condemn Isaac Newton. He is not a literary man; he does not claim to be such; but he is a man who has made his living on a farm in Pennsylvania, and has shown himself entitled to the respect and confidence of every one with whom he has been associated. I venture to say, if you will give me a committee of this House, I will prove more frauds, rascalities, and profligacy in any Department of the Government than you can find in the bureau under Isaac Newton. And who ever charged him with dishonesty except some one who has been turned out of the Department or who wants to get in, like the man who was at the head of the Census Bureau? These men have sent out papers to Iowa and Illinois and all the western States, to the agricultural fairs and committees, asking them to indorse their statements against Mr. Newton and send them back; these are the men who get up charges against him and are now attempting to break him down and get his place. I am astonished that members will lend themselves to help break down a Department in this way by bringing charges against an honest and faithful public officer.

I repeat, there is no man on this floor who can prove an act of dishonesty against this man, and I doubt whether there is a better practical farmer in the country. If you want to break down the Department, take away the appropriation; but do not make charges against an honest man like Isaac Newton, whose character is as dear to him as that of any member on this floor.

The amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. KASSON. I would suggest whether it is not time to bring the discussion to a close on this clause. It is very important that we should get through this bill. We are making no progress. Every member knows how the business is crowded on the Calendar of the House, and I appeal to the House by unanimous consent to close debate on this paragraph in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. KASSON. Then I move that the committee rise.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, resumed the chair.

Mr. BIDWELL. I hope the gentleman will not debar me a word of explanation.

Mr. KASSON. I intend to move to close debate in five minutes when the House resolves itself again in Committee of the Whole, and then the gentleman can have an opportunity to be heard.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. KASSON. I now move that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the special order, all debate upon the pending paragraph be closed in five minutes.

Mr. KOONTZ. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion and let us have an understanding that to-morrow be devoted to debate on the President's message.

Mr. KASSON. I wish members to consider the condition of the business of the House. The consideration of the unavoidable appropriation bills will render it impossible for us to make the progress that every member desires unless every day during the remainder of the session shall be given to the transaction of the regular business. It is necessary that at least three weeks constant attention should be given to the appropriation bills, to the exclusion of any other that may be presented.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] submit his proposition to the House?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Gentlemen object to it, and there is no use submitting it to the House.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of D. J. Baldwin, and 12 others, citizens of Michigan City, Indiana, asking Congress not to withdraw or curtail the circulation of the national currency, &c.

Also, the petition of John Conger, and 8 others, soldiers of the war of 1812, residents of Albion, Michigan, praying for a pension.

By Mr. ALLEY: The petition of Andrew Geyer, and sundry citizens of Massachusetts, asking that the law in regard to newspaper postage be so amended as to allow semi-weekly papers to go free of postage within the country where published.

By Mr. BROOMALL: The petition of sundry citizens of DeCATUR, Illinois, and also the petition of citizens of Bement, Piatt county, Illinois, both praying Congress to pass no law curtailing the currency.

By Mr. DEMING: The petition of cigar manufacturers of Hartford, Connecticut, for relief from ad valorem tax on cigars.

By Mr. DONNELLY: The petition of Stephen Hewson, and others, citizens of Isanto county, Minnesota, in favor of the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States giving Congress the power to regulate suffrage in the States of the Union; and providing that no inequality should exist in the rights of citizens of the United States by reason of birth, race, or color; and that all such inequalities should be immediately removed by Congress in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the lately rebellious States.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: The petition of William Coffin, and others, of Batavia, Illinois, against any further reduction of the volume of currency, and against an early return to specie payments.

Also, the petition of cigar-makers of Aurora, Illinois, for a change in the law in regard to stamps, &c., of cigars, and other purposes.

By Mr. INGERSOLL: The petition of Mrs. Lydia Winter, of Bureau county, Illinois, praying for a pension.

Also, the memorial of Francis Dainese, of Washington, District of Columbia.

By Mr. HENDERSON: A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, in reference to ocean-steam mail service.

By Mr. HILL: The petition of citizens of Madison, Indiana, asking a reduction of the tax on manufacture of cigars.

Also, the petition of citizens of Madison, Indiana, asking a reduction of tax on manufacture of cigars.

By Mr. HUMPHREY: The proceedings of a meeting of the soldiers in the war of 1812, held at Buffalo, New York, on the 8th day of January instant, recommending the passage of a law granting pensions to all persons who served in said war to the same extent as now allowed to soldiers of the war of the Revolution.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: The memorial of citizens of Claysville and vicinity, in the county of Washington, Pennsylvania, charging A. Johnson, acting President of the United States, with high crimes and misdemeanor, and asking his impeachment.

Also, the petition of James Dougherty, of Greene county, Pennsylvania, a soldier of the war of 1812, for pension.

By Mr. LYNCH: The petition of W. F. Abbot, and others, for change in tax on cigars.

By Mr. PAINE: The petition of John Howard, and others, citizens of Milwaukee county, Wisconsin, for the impeachment of Andrew Johnson.

By Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania: The petition of Bridget Donovan, guardian of minor children of William Whelan, deceased, of company H, one hundred and sixth Veteran volunteers.

By Mr. RAYMOND: The petition of 120 persons engaged in the business of dressing fur skins in the State of New York, praying for an increase of duties on fur skins, dressed and partly dressed, imported from abroad.

Also, a similar petition from dressers of fur skins in the State of Massachusetts.

Also, a similar petition from dressers of fur skins in Philadelphia.

By Mr. SAWYER: The petition of W. Powell, and 90 others, citizens of Oshkosh, Winnebago county, Wisconsin, praying for the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, Vice President and acting President of the United States.

Also, the petition of James T. Elmore, and 80 others, citizens of Green Bay and Fort Howard, Wisconsin, praying for the improvement of Green Bay harbor, at the mouth of Fox river, in the State of Wisconsin.

By Mr. STROUSE: The petition of cigar manufacturers at Pottsville, Pennsylvania, for a change in the tax on cigars.

Also, two petitions of citizens of Lebanon, Pennsylvania, against any curtailment of the currency, &c.

By Mr. UPSON: The petition of William L. Stoughton, and 77 others, citizens of Sturgis, St. Joseph county, Michigan, against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or compelling national banks to redeem their circulating notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances.

By Mr. WARD, of New York: The petition of Noble Hill, and others, of Steuben county, New York, for increase of the tariff upon wool.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts: The petition of H. S. Porter, and 53 others, citizens of Hatfield, Massachusetts, for a reduction of the tax on cigars, and that the tax be changed from ad valorem to specific tax.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 12, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that leave be granted to the Committee of Ways and Means to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask the Chair whether the members of the committee will have the right to come in and record their votes?

The SPEAKER. Under the ruling of the previous Congress members of the committee can come in and have their votes recorded before the result is announced, but not afterward.

There was no objection, and leave was granted to the Committee of Ways and Means to sit during the session of the House.

REWARD FOR JEFF. DAVIS.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill authorizing the payment of the reward offered by the President of the United States in April, 1865, for the capture of Jefferson Davis; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to secure the speedy construction of the Union Pacific railroad, southern branch, and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES M. BISHOP.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back House bill No. 496, for the relief of James M. Bishop, who claims $236, with the recommendation it do pass.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to ascertain and allow to James M. Bishop, of Quincy, Illinois, for services in March and April, 1863, to finish the work left undone on the assessment lists in the fourth district of Illinois by Mr. Lutkin, an assistant assessor, at his decease, such a sum as shall be equal to that now fixed by law to be paid assistant assessors for such service; the said sum of money, when ascertained, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full for his claim, with interest since June 1, 1863.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will state in reference to this bill it is for services rendered and deemed to be correct by the Department on the decease of the then assessor or assistant assessor. There was no law under which the bill could be paid. The committee thought it was a very just one.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PATENTS FOR LAND.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to declare the effect of certain patents for lands; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

FREE TRADE.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

Resolved, That the American Government ought to protect American industry; but if the people are compelled to submit to free trade in the products of agriculture, they ought to have at the same time free trade in the products of manufacture.

ROBERT M'CANDLESS.

Mr. CULLOM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting a pension to Robert M'Candless; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

RIFLE CANNON.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that the Navy of the United States is unprovided with rifle cannon of large caliber corresponding with those used in European service; and whereas experiments have been made by American citizens in the construction of wrought-iron cannon of large caliber suitable for rifle shot and calculated to supply the alleged deficiency in the naval ordnance of the United States, if any such deficiency in fact exists:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed from this House, with power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses under oath, and fully to inquire and report to this House as to the facts of such alleged deficiency of rifle cannon of large caliber in the naval service of the United States, and to ascertain and report what experiments, if any, have been made by citizens of the United States to supply such deficiency, and the result of such experiments; and to ascertain and report to this House what transactions, if any, have been made between the Secretary of the Navy or other Departments of the Government and citizens of the United States in relation to the construction of wrought-iron cannon of heavy caliber, and whether there are any sums equitably due from the Government in consequence of such transactions, and to report by bill for the payment of the same, and to report by bill or otherwise such measures as may be required to place the Navy of the United States in the supply of rifle cannon of heavy caliber upon equality with the navies of Europe.

Mr. KASSON. I object, and demand the regular order of business.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has commenced, and the first business in order is the call of the committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee on Indian Affairs, where the call rested on yesterday.

ABIAL MORRISON.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill to indemnify Abial Morrison, of the State of Oregon, for property destroyed by hostile Indians in Washington Territory in the years 1855 and 1856; which was read a first and second time. The bill authorizes the payment of $3,492 out of money due by the United States to the Yakima and Klikitat tribes of Indians.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BOUNTIES TO PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the payment of bounties to the soldiers of the one hundred and eighty-sixth regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SURGEON LEWIS DYER.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill No. 382, for the relief of Lewis Dyer, late surgeon of the eighty-first regiment of Illinois volunteers.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read at length. It directs the proper accounting officer to audit and settle the accounts of Lewis Dyer, late surgeon of the eighty-first regiment of Illinois volunteers, and allow him the pay and emoluments of a surgeon of volunteers from the 6th day of April, 1863, to the 26th day of May following, deducting therefrom any amount which may appear to have been heretofore paid him by error.

Mr. WARD, of New York. If there is a report accompanying the bill I ask that it may be read.

The report was read. It states that the petitioner claims pay as surgeon in the United States Army from the 6th of April, 1863, to the 26th of May following. It appears in the evidence that the petitioner was surgeon on duty with the eighty-first regiment Illinois infantry, near Vicksburg, on the 6th day of April, 1863, when, on account of some charges preferred against him by the regimental officers, he was summarily dismissed the service. An investigation was made at the request of General McPherson, which resulted in the restoration of the petitioner on the 26th of May following. It is proved by the statement of J. H. Baucher, medical director of the seventeenth Army corps, and other officers then in the service, that the petitioner continued to perform the duties of surgeon (as if no order for his dismissal had been made) during the whole time between the 6th of April, 1863, and the 26th of May following, and that these services were demanded by the Army then in the field and in need of surgeons. The petitioner was dismissed the service, without a hearing, at a time when the Government needed his services. In view of the necessities of the service, although under sentence of dismissal, he appears to have volunteered his assistance to the officer in command, and his services were accepted and faithfully rendered. On examination of all the facts in the case, the committee are of opinion the petitioner should be paid, and report the accompanying bill.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY A. RIPLEY.

Mr. DEMING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do not pass, Senate bill No. 546, for the relief of Mary A. Ripley.

The bill was accordingly laid upon the table.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

On motion of Mr. DEMING, the Committee on Military Affairs were discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Peter Van Ael, of Maximilian Rosenberg, of citizens of New York for bounty or pensions to hospital nurses, and of Daniel P. Cilley, chaplain of the twenty-sixth New York veteran cavalry; which were laid upon table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I was absent when the Committee for the District of Columbia was called; I ask unanimous consent that the committee may now be allowed their regular time for bills of a private character.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Let the bill be read, which I see the gentleman has in his hand ready to report.

The SPEAKER. The question is not in regard to any particular bill, but whether the Committee for the District of Columbia shall now be allowed their regular time for the consideration of business of a private nature.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I desire to reserve my right to object until after the bill is read.

Senate bill No. 218, to exempt the property of debtors in the District of Columbia from levy, attachment, or sale on execution, was then read.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The question is whether there is any objection to allowing the Committee for the District of Columbia to take their regular time now.

No objection was made.

EXEMPTION LAW IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, Senate bill No. 218, exempting the property of debtors in the District of Columbia from levy, attachment, or sale on execution, with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The bill was read at length. It provides that the following property, being the property of a head of a family or householder, shall be exempt from distraint, attachment, levy, and sale on execution or decree of any court in the District of Columbia; provided this exemption shall not interfere with the foreclosure of any mortgage or deed of trust executed before the passage of this act, to wit: all wearing apparel belonging to all persons, and to all heads of families, being householders; all beds, bedding, household furniture, stoves, cooking utensils, &c., not exceeding $300 in value; provisions for three months' support, whether provided or growing; fuel for three months; mechanics' tools and implements of the debtor's trade or business amounting to $200 in value, with $200 worth of stock for carrying on the business of the debtor or his family; the library and implements of a professional man or artist to the value of $300; one horse, mule, or yoke of oxen; one cart, wagon, or dray, and harness for such team; farming utensils, with food for such team for three months, and if the debtor be a farmer, any other farming tools of the value of $100; all family pictures, and all the family library; one cow, one swine, six sheep; and no deed of trust, bill of sale, or mortgage upon any of said exempted articles, shall be binding or valid unless signed by the wife of the debtor, if he be married and living with his wife; and these exemptions shall be valid when the said property is in transitu the same as if the property were at rest; provided no property named and exempted in this act shall be exempted from attachment or execution for any debt due for the wages of servants, common laborers, or clerks, except the wearing apparel, beds and bedding, and household furniture and provisions for the debtor and family.

The first question was upon the following amendment reported from the committee:

Add to the bill the following:

Provided further. That this act shall not in any manner interfere with the collection of any debt, or the enforcement of any contract made prior to the passage of this act, and shall apply to cases founded upon contract only.

Mr. ROSS. I would like my friend [Mr. INGERSOLL] to yield to me to move an amendment that a homestead of the value of not exceeding $1,000 shall be exempted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not think I can yield this morning for that purpose.

Mr. ROSS. That is the Illinois State law.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I know it is. I know that in the State of Illinois and perhaps in some other States the law exempts a homestead of $1,000 as long as the family resides upon it. If the gentleman desires to have a law of that character for this District he should introduce a separate bill for that purpose, because there are a great many qualifications which should be attached to it. For that reason I cannot yield to allow the amendment to be offered to this bill.

Mr. ROSS. Will the gentleman permit me to make a motion that the bill be recommitted with instructions to report an amendment of the character I have indicated?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I cannot, for the reasons I have already stated. The gentleman will remember that in our State it is a distinct act, independent of all other exemptions of personal property; and I think it should be the same here.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will yield for an inquiry.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If I understand the amendment of the committee it excepts from the operation of this bill all actions for tort. Why should actions for tort be excepted? Why should a man by his tort deprive his family of the benefits of this exemption? It seems to me there would be much more propriety in excepting actions on contract. If a man makes a contract and agrees to abide by it, it seems to me there would be much more propriety in excepting it from a statute of exemption than to except an action for his tort merely. I think there should at least be the same exception of judgments for a contract as for a tort. I would like my colleague [Mr. INGERSOLL] to explain why he makes this difference.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The only reason I can give in favor of the present form of the bill—whether it is a good reason is for the House to determine—is, that if an exemption were provided in actions of tort it might have a tendency to produce breaches of the peace, men knowing that there would be no liability to the sale of their property for any judgment that might be rendered against them. This was the only reason urged in the committee; and it was deemed to be especially applicable to Washington city, where the population is to a great extent of a transient character, and where a provision of the sort referred to might have a bad tendency.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The punishment of the offender personally for a breach of the peace would, it seems to me, have more terror than the fact that his property might be levied upon. Let a man be proceeded against personally and punished by imprisonment for any tort he may commit, but do not let a family be robbed of the means of support on account of the tort of the head of the family.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection personally to extending this exemption to cases of tort committed by the head of a family. I am willing that the amendment suggested by my colleague shall be adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to one or two points; and first I beg leave to say that I would object very seriously to a bill extending this exemption to cases of tort. Take the case of slander or libel, which is punishable by damages; it might be argued that by compelling a man to pay damages for the injury he has done his neighbor by slander or libel you rob his family to that extent of their means of support. The same argument might be used in the case of a fine inflicted upon a man as punishment for his crime.

But this is not the point to which I desired to call attention. I do not see that the bill makes any provision for a proper estimate of what is a sufficient provision for three months' support of a family. There is no provision for any appraisement by any marshal, constable, or other officer. Who is to make this assessment? Is the officer to exercise his own judgment? He might not know how large the family was; and if he should not set apart sufficient for the maintenance of the family is he to be held responsible to the debtor for having set apart too little? It strikes me that the bill should contain some provision for the selection of suitable persons as appraisers, so that the executive officers might be relieved of that responsibility.

One word as to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] in regard to the exemption of the homestead to the amount of $1,000. Such exemptions are common in the western States, and in those States are proper. There are reasons why the new States should extend to persons proposing to settle there advantages which they do not enjoy in the old States. But in a city like this, where the population is to a great extent transient in its character, an exemption of that sort would operate injuriously. It is not proper that a man should come here and, on the strength of a small homestead, contract debts to the amount of $1,000, then set his creditors at defiance, sell his homestead, and move away. The reasons in favor of a large exemption in the Territories and new States do not apply to this city, where the population is of a different character.

As I have already remarked, it strikes me that the bill in its present form is defective because it does not provide for suitable persons to make the assessment of the property to be set apart for the maintenance of the family.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am inclined, Mr. Speaker, to concur in the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] with reference to the assessment of the specified amount of provisions to be allowed for the support of a family. If the gentleman can frame an amendment to meet the case I shall be very happy to give it my concurrence.

I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio, my colleague on the committee, [Mr. WELKER.]

Mr. WELKER. There is one objection to the amendment reported by the committee, to which I want to call the attention of the House. It provides that this exemption shall not apply to debts contracted after the passage of this bill. I think that that provision is unusual in legislation of this kind. In all the States where property is exempted from execution the law always applies to existing indebtedness. I object that this clause of exemption shall be confined to indebtedness that may occur after the passage of the law, and I hope, therefore, that this amendment will not be adopted. If we attempt to afford relief to this class of debtors in the District of Columbia, let us do it so far as past indebtedness is concerned as well as in relation to debts that may be incurred after the passage of the act. I hope the House will not adopt the amendment reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. MERCUR. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to differ from my colleague on the committee who last addressed the House in reference to the restrictive clause of this bill by which it is confined to debts incurred after its passage. It seems to me that it is right and proper, as a general proposition, that a man shall have the benefit of all laws which were in force and effect at the time his contract was entered into. I am aware that it is held by the courts in many of the States that there is a difference between the contract itself and the remedy for its enforcement; that Congress has the right to impair the remedy I have no doubt. But I question very much the expediency of exercising that right, except in extreme cases; and it seems to me that this is not such an extreme case as to call for the exercise of any such power. The bill, as framed and reported, limits its operation to contracts entered into after the passage of the law, which, to my mind, is just and reasonable.

The other amendment is in reference to restricting the operation of the bill to actions predicated on contracts. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] objects to this, and can see no good reason why it should not extend to cases of tort. I will mention one reason which it strikes me has force, and shows that this restrictive clause should be kept in the bill. It is this: a man who commits a tort in taking the personal property of his neighbor may have judgment recovered against him. That is the usual remedy which the owner of personal property resort to in a case of trespass or trover to get a judgment against the man who has taken from the owner personal property which it is adjudged has been improperly taken from him. He holds it exempt from execution. He sets at defiance the man whose rights he has infringed upon; and who has recovered a judgment against him; and there is no remedy by which the plaintiff can collect the amount of damages awarded to him by the court. It may be said, however, that instead of bringing an action of trespass and trover the man may bring an action of replevin and thus recover the specific article taken. I answer that it is not the province of the law to encourage expensive litigation, but to leave the ordinary and usual action open to every one whose rights of property have been infringed upon, and not only enable him to recover judgment, but enable him when he has recovered it to enforce it by execution, and not to enable the other party to retain the property and set the law at defiance; and therefore, in my judgment, this is a proper limitation.

Mr. INGERSOLL obtained the floor.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. BROMWELL. I desire to offer the following amendment to the bill:

The officer charged with the execution of any writ of attachment or execution shall ascertain the value and amount of provisions to be allowed to any family under this act by summoning three householders of the District, who shall, being first duly sworn by said officer faithfully to perform their duty, proceed to set apart the provisions necessary for the debtor's family, according to this act, if such provisions be found on the premises or in the possession of the debtor; and if not, they shall make out a return to such officer of the value of such provisions, and the same shall be allowed on any property of the debtor.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment of the committee, as amended, was also agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in line twenty-one, after the word "library" to insert the words "not exceeding in value $400."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was read a third time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. THAYER the title was amended by striking out the word "the" and inserting the word "certain;" so as to read, "An act to exempt certain property of debtors in the District of Columbia from levy, attachment, or sale on execution."

NATIONAL LIFE AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Mr. MERCUR. I am instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 290, to incorporate the National Life and Accident Insurance Company of the District of Columbia.

No objection was made; and the bill was accordingly read a third time. It declares H. D. Cooke, Charles Knap, Abram B. Olin, S. W. Lathrop, S. Fowler, John C. Durant, S. A. Peugh, John McKelvin, C. T. Sherman, Calvin O. Chaffee, John Murphy, John B. Hutchinson, A. M. Clapp, Giles F. Tilley, R. W. Latham, and Thomas Hood a corporation under the above title.

Mr. THAYER. I wish to ask the gentlemen on the Committee for the District of Columbia to allow me to move an amendment, in the shape of a proviso, that no insurance shall be effected by this company until at least $30,000 of the capital has been paid in in cash.

Mr. ALLISON. Better make it $100,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Suppose they do not regard it, how will it appear that they have not paid it in?

Mr. THAYER. If they were to insure in contravention of their charter they would be subjected to instant forfeiture of all the franchises granted by it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That would have to be done by a court.

Mr. THAYER. It would be done by a quo warranto.

Mr. MERCUR. I suggest to my colleague [Mr. THAYER] that instead of inserting a proviso he move to increase the amount of the first installment from five dollars to twenty or twenty-five dollars.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to consult the wishes of the committee and I will therefore move to increase the amount of cash required to be paid on each share to thirty dollars.

Mr. MERCUR. The shares I believe are fifty dollars.

The SPEAKER. The shares are $100 in the bill in the hands of the Clerk.

Mr. THAYER. I ask to have that part of the bill read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Said capital stock shall be divided into shares of $100 each, and there shall be paid into the treasury of the company by each subscriber to said capital stock at the time of subscribing an installment of five dollars on each share of stock subscribed for, and a further installment of five dollars on each share at such time thereafter, not less than thirty days from the former, as this commission or incorporators may determine.

Mr. THAYER. I move to strike out the word "five" and insert "thirty."

A MEMBER. The whole capital stock is $1,000,000.

Mr. THAYER. But the minimum is $100,000, and what I want is to require $30,000 to be paid in at the outset.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the second section by inserting near the close, after the word "incorporation," the words "beyond the full amount of the shares subscribed for by him;" so that the clause will read as follows:

But no stockholder of said incorporation shall, in any event, be liable in his private capacity for the debts and liabilities of this incorporation beyond the full amount of the shares subscribed for by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MERCUR] whether the subscription after the payment of the thirty dollars per share, or the thirty per cent., is to be secured in any other mode than by the notes of the subscribers; whether there is any other tangible security.

Mr. MERCUR. The bill provides—

That the accumulated funds of said company over and above the expenses, losses, and the guarantee fund may be invested in bonds, national bank stock, real estate, bond and mortgage, deeds of trust, or dividends, as the directors may determine.

Mr. DAVIS. The company is allowed to go into business on the payment in of $30,000 or $100,000; therefore the public have only the security of $100,000 in addition to the security of the makers of the notes or subscribers to the stock. I want to know if there is any other security.

Mr. ALLISON. As I gather from the reading of the bill, the balance of the subscriptions must be secured as the incorporators may see proper to require. That is the provision in relation to security. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MERCUR] who has charge of the bill a question. I desire to know from the gentleman whether or no there is any provision in this bill which requires this corporation to make a statement to the public of the condition of their affairs.

Mr. MERCUR. There is a clause requiring the secretary of the corporation to make an annual report to the Secretary of the Interior showing all the material transactions of the company.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire, then, to suggest a further proviso to the bill. It seems to me that the operations of this company should be confined to the District of Columbia; otherwise this corporation may extend its business to every State in this Union without being subject to the local and State jurisdiction, and the people throughout the country may have no accurate knowledge of the condition of this corporation. Now, if it is a corporation designed for the accommodation of the people of this District its operations should be confined to the District; and I therefore move to add at the close of the last section of the bill this proviso:

Provided, That the operations of the company shall be confined to the District of Columbia.

Mr. MERCUR. I take it that all these insurance companies may take risks in any State of the Union, subject to the local laws of that State, and even foreign corporations can do the same. Hence I say that there is no reason for this amendment, because before in any State they permit corporations incorporated by Congress to take risks they will take ample security for their own citizens. I see no reason why an incorporation established by authority of Congress should have its powers and authority limited to the District of Columbia. There are insurance companies authorized by virtue of State legislation in most of the States of the Union, and this company should stand upon the same footing with them, subject to the laws of the several States in which they attempt to operate or perform any of their functions. I hope the House will attach no restrictive clause to this charter, because it will cripple the operations of the company.

Mr. ALLISON. It will be claimed by this company that inasmuch as it is incorporated by authority of the Congress of the United States it is not subject, and cannot be made subject, to State authority; I think, therefore, that the business of this corporation should be confined to the District of Columbia, where the Congress of the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, and I trust my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MERCUR. While I think this amendment excessively objectionable, I would personally make no objection to a clause providing that all risks taken in any State shall be subject to the laws of that State. That would obviate the anticipated objection of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON;] but it seems to me that a clause restricting the operations of the company to the District of Columbia would be unjust and improper.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] I understand him to propose that a limitation shall be laid upon the operations of this company which shall confine them to the District of Columbia. Now, would it not be fair to allow a corporation created by Congress to transact its business in the States of the Union on an equal footing with corporations created by the State Legislatures? In the State of Connecticut, for instance, there have been created by the State Legislature many insurance companies; and they are not confined in their operations to their own State, but come into Illinois and into all the States, subject to the local laws of those States, and come in competition with the local institutions of those States, subject to such local regulations as the States see proper to impose upon them. I move the following amendment to the amendment:

That the operations of this company may be extended to all the States of the Union, subject to the laws of the respective States.

The question was put on the amendment to the amendment; and there were—ayes 27, noes 22; no quorum voting.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. The first business in order is the consideration of Senate bill No. 456, for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union, which was pending as unfinished business when the House adjourned on Thursday last.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to postpone the further consideration of that bill until the joint resolution for the increased compensation of clerks in the civil service at Washington shall have been disposed of. It will take but a few minutes to pass it, as it has already been engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. KASSON. I thought it was understood by the House when we adjourned on yesterday that we would proceed to-day with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill in the Committee of the Whole. It is a bill to furnish means to carry on the regular operations of the Government, and therefore of more importance than this extra compensation bill. If the compensation bill should now be taken up I am afraid it will entirely prevent us from getting the appropriation bill through the House to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has the right to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the special order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have twice waived my right to have this bill put upon its passage for the sake of giving to the House a morning hour. Now, if the bill shall not be considered and disposed of to-day it cannot be taken up on Monday under the rules, and on Tuesday the special order, the bill on reconstruction presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will come up for consideration. I hope that gentlemen will not take advantage of my forbearance in twice waiving my right to put this resolution upon its passage. It is now engrossed and has been read a third time, and can soon be disposed of.

Mr. KASSON. I would inquire of the Chair what is the pending motion upon the bill for increased compensation to clerks.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon seconding the call for the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

The SPEAKER. The compensation bill is not now before the House. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to postpone the further consideration of the Nebraska bill. If that motion is agreed to, then the House joint resolution No. 224, giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington, will come up for consideration, that being the next pending unfinished business.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I would inquire of the Chair what would be the condition of the Nebraska bill should this compensation bill be now taken up and disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It will again come up as unfinished business when the compensation joint resolution shall have been disposed of.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. GARFIELD to postpone for the present the further consideration of the Nebraska bill; and upon a division there were—ayes seventy-seven; noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STOKES asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. ARNELL, for ten days.

INCREASED PAY OF CIVIL EMPLOYEES.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service at Washington.

The pending question was upon seconding the call for the previous question upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD], who called the previous question, withdraw his call for a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot withdraw the call. This bill has already been engrossed and read a third time, and no amendment can now be made to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to inquire whether, if the previous question should not now be seconded upon the passage of the joint resolution, it would then be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time?

The SPEAKER. That motion would then be in order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. And the joint resolution would then be open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It would should the motion to reconsider prevail.

The question was then taken upon seconding the call for the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 59, noes 51.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 59, noes 55.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; which was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. WARD, of New York. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

Mr. STEVENS. By a law of the last session the pay of female employes was increased. I would inquire of the gentleman if by this joint resolution the female clerks will receive this increased compensation at the rate of twenty per cent?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose it was intended to include them when the committee drafted the bill; but if, as the gentleman says, their pay has been increased within the present fiscal year, that is since June 30, 1866, my opinion is that they will receive twenty per cent., minus that additional compensation.

Mr. STEVENS. No; it will not give them anything, because the $900 is a larger increase than twenty per cent.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I fear they would not receive anything under the resolution as it now stands. But everybody knows that if the bill needs amendment in this respect or any other it can be made in the Senate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

On the motion of Mr. GARFIELD there were—ayes 60, noes 53.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, and Mr. ROSS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-five; noes not counted.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. WARD, of New York. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] that he had better withdraw his motion, and let the vote be taken at once on the passage of the resolution. It will amount to the same thing.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the passage of the joint resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ROLLINS. I call for the reading of the joint resolution; as now amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there shall be allowed and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following-described persons employed in the civil service at Washington, namely: to clerks, messengers, watchmen, and laborers, and all the civil employes whose pay or salaries do not exceed the sum of $3,500 each, as fixed by law prior to June 30, 1864, and including temporary clerks and female clerks and employes in the Department of State, and in the Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Post Office, and Agricultural Departments, in the office of the Attorney General, Coast Survey, Naval Observatory, navy-yard, Paymaster General, including the division of referred claims, office of Commissary General of Prisoners, Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, in the office at the Capital extension, city post office, enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine corps, or general service of the United States serving as clerks, messengers, watchmen, or laborers in any bureau of the War Department, lamplighters

under Commissioner of Public Buildings, and detectives of the Metropolitan police, an additional compensation of twenty per cent. on their respective salaries or pay for one year from and after the 30th day of June, 1866: Provided, That the above-named additional compensation to the employes of the Pension Office be paid out of the funds of said office, and that where the salary or pay of any person entitled to receive additional compensation under this resolution has been increased by law since the date of June 30, 1864, aforesaid, except those clerks in the office of the Quartermaster General whose pay was equalized with that of first-class clerks by act of July, 1866, or where such person may have received during the current fiscal year additional compensation through the action of any head of any Department from funds placed by law in his hands for distribution, such person shall be entitled to receive only so much as will make the whole sum received as additional compensation equal to twenty per cent. on his salary or pay as aforesaid: Provided further, That such additional compensation shall be held to apply to all female clerks or employes in any bureau or division in the Treasury Department whose compensation does not exceed sixty dollars per month: And provided further, That this resolution shall apply only to such persons as may be in service at the time of the passage of this resolution.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 40, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashley, Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Bunker, W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deffrees, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Henderson, Hill, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Kasson, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Koontz, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Loftwich, Loan, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McIndoe, Me- Ruer, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Plants, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stillwell, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Townbridge, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Arnell, Baker, Baldwin, Benjamin, Boutwell, Brownell, Campbell, Cook, Doring, Driggs, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, James R. Hubbell, Julian, Kuykendall, William Lawrence, Maynard, McKee, Moulton, Orth, Pike, Price, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Shanklin, Stevens, Stokes, Thornton, Upson, Van Aernam, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, and James F. Wilson—40.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Beaman, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Conkling, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dumont, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Goodyear, Harris, Hayes, Higby, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Isabel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jencks, Jones, Kelley, Ladin, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McCallough, Miller, Morris, Myers, Newell, Patterson, Phelps, Pomroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rousseau, Sloan, Starr, Strouse, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Whaley, Williams, Winfield, and Wright—52.

So the joint resolution was passed.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. DEMING. My colleague, Mr. BRANDEGEE, is absent by leave of the House on business of the Committee on Naval Affairs. If he were present he would vote for the joint resolution.

Mr. O'NEIL. My colleague, Mr. MYERS, is absent by leave on business of a select committee. If here he would vote in favor of this joint resolution.

Mr. RADFORD. My colleague, Mr. WINFIELD, is absent on account of sickness. If he were present he would vote for the passage of this joint resolution.

Mr. DRIGGS. My colleague, Mr. LONGYEAR, is detained from the House by sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANNA R. SHEET.

On motion by Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the petition and papers of Anna R. Sheet with a view to their reference to the Pension Bureau.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KASSON. Before moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I move that all debate on the paragraphs relating to the Department of Agriculture be closed in twenty minutes after the committee shall resume the consideration of the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

The Chairman stated the pending amendment to be as follows:

On page 83, line seven hundred and eighty-six, strike out "eighty" and insert "forty-five;" so that it will read:

For purchase of cereal, vegetable, and flower-seeds, and for labor in putting up seed, seed-bags, and miscellaneous items, $45,000.

He also stated that debate by order of the House was limited to twenty minutes on the pending subject.

Mr. BIDWELL. Mr. Chairman, in the debate which occurred yesterday on this question allusions were made to the investigation pending before the Committee on Agriculture. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL] appealed to me as chairman of that committee to corroborate what he said. I wish to state in advance it is not my purpose to exaggerate or to misrepresent anybody. His question was very general and my answer was general.

In addition, I will state now that I will not corroborate all of the facts enumerated in every particular; but I will say, speaking generally, that I believe the case will prove to be more unfavorable than he stated it. But in saying this I do not feel at liberty to so declare as chairman of that committee, for the reason that the majority of the committee differed from me. In stating this, I state it as an individual member of that committee, and as my own private opinion on that question.

It was my intention, Mr. Chairman, to reply to an intimation from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TROWBRIDGE] that I was in a minority on that committee. I never denied it. I will prosecute what I consider to be my duty in the investigation of the subject referred to that committee by this House though I may be in the minority. I am proud to be in a minority so long as I consider myself conscious of doing my duty. We differed on that committee, differed in opinion, and doubtless we differed honestly in opinion. And if any one has the curiosity to know whether my judgment was correct or the judgment of the majority of the committee, all they have to do is to call for the testimony taken before that committee. It was also my purpose to refer to a remark made, Mr. Chairman, by yourself; but on looking over the report in the Globe I feel inclined to believe I was mistaken. I thought the gentleman, in alluding to the chairman of the committee and his difference with the majority of that committee, inveighed against the minority of the committee. In reading the language I am happy to say I do not think it will bear that construction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I beg to say I hope this appropriation will not be cut down. It would be like cutting down the appropriation for the War Department or any other Department of this Government simply because the head of it may be exceptionable. I think the great agricultural interests of this country require this appropriation should be made.

I beg leave to say that the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN AERNAM] has an amendment to make to this item in the appropriation bill, which I think should meet with the concurrence of the committee. I suppose it is in order to move an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be.

Mr. BIDWELL. It is known to every one there is a valuable and interesting collection in the Department of Agriculture belonging to the entomologist, Mr. Glover, which he has spent years in forming, he being a highly scientific gentleman. It certainly would prove of great value to the agricultural interest of the country. It will form the nucleus of one of the grandest museums in the world.

I think in making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, a certain amount should be set apart in order to collect specimens of natural history, especially those which concern agriculture. This collection is now about the only interesting thing in the Department, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be agreed to.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself for a moment or two to the amendment before the House, which is to reduce the appropriation for the collection and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture from $80,000 to $45,000. Last year there was appropriated for this purpose the sum of $65,000. This year the Department ask for an increase of $15,000. I understand the reason is that they desire to extend the field of distribution of these seeds into the region lately in rebellion. I apprehend the mere statement of this fact, coupled with the knowledge of members of the House of the condition of that country, recently overrun by four years of devastating war, and cut off during all that time from the advantages of this distribution of seeds, will be sufficient to commend and justify the appropriation. While perhaps no member of the House will go further than I will in regard to the political restoration or reconstruction of these States, I assume that it is the interest of this country to encourage in every possible way the development of agriculture; and that is all that is proposed in this appropriation.

I desire to say one word in regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] to discontinue this Department because the head of it does not exactly suit him. I have before me the bill creating and establishing this Department, and by an examination of it I find that the present Commissioner has discharged his entire duty under it; and if there is any fault to be found it is with Congress for not having more extensively provided for the necessities of the Department. I admit that a reorganization of that Department—and perhaps of some other Departments—by making the head of it a Cabinet officer, would be a very desirable thing; but I do not think we have arrived at that stage of development of the Department to provide for that. It may be proper at some future time; but since the organization of the Department this country has been directing its attention entirely to the prosecution of a great war. The Department is growing up and making itself useful, and in a very short time, perhaps, it will be necessary to reorganize it on a much more extensive scale. But until it is reorganized I claim that a plain, practical business man is better at the head of it than a scientific man, as suggested yesterday. I trust the House will leave the appropriation as it stands—$80,000. That certainly is not a large amount to be spent for this purpose.

Mr. DELANO. I have an amendment which I desire to offer—to add at the end of line seven hundred and ninety-one the following proviso:

Provided, That no money shall hereafter be paid to the present Commissioner on account of his salary, except so much as may be due for past services.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not now in order.

Mr. DELANO. Then I will make my remarks without offering it. I want to be distinctly understood as not participating in the accusations of dishonesty or want of integrity on the part of the man who administers this Department. I do not stand here to defend him against such charges, but I desire distinctly to be understood as not joining in them. I do not know whether they are true or not; but I do aver that it is the universal sentiment of the agriculturists of the country that he is incompetent for the position he holds, and there is a general feeling and desire that he should be removed.

The interest that he represents I took occasion to allude to yesterday as of vast importance. We have frequently given public lands for agricultural schools, and the whole amount so given will reach the sum of about five million dollars. The proceeds are in the hands of the State Legislatures, and are being used for the purpose of disseminating knowledge among agriculturists; and the time has come when we should all look more to the culture of that interest and bestow upon it that legislation which its importance demands. That can never be done, in my opinion, while this Department is in the hands of the present incumbent.

I will give you an instance of his intelligence—I have it from a former member of this House, now high in office: being in conversation with him some time ago on the subject of the origin and nativity of the Irish potato, to test the old gentleman's knowledge he asked him what his opinion was on the subject. Assuming a gravity that the occasion demanded, the Commissioner said: "It is a subject upon which I have bestowed a great deal of attention and much reading, but have not fully come to a conclusion in regard to it; but my best opinion is, that it originated in Pennsylvania." [Laughter.] I do not know, sir, if that was the reason that you found it necessary yesterday to come down from the Chair and defend this officer. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Can the gentleman prove that it is not so? [Laughter.]

Mr. DELANO. What is the name of that beautiful stream in Pennsylvania where some variety of this potato is said to have been cultivated once? Ah, the Neshannock.

But enough upon that subject. I only alluded to this as one of numerous instances of the same kind, and I say that it is a disgrace to the country that this man should be forced on the agricultural interest; it is lamentable that the President of the United States, who can find time to permeate the land with spies to find out who is going to vote for officers who will sustain his "policy," cannot find time to take this man's case in hand and provide properly for this great and important interest. I hope, therefore, as we have no other way of reaching this matter, that the House will apply this principle of withholding the supplies which was applied at the last session in the case of the minister to Portugal.

Mr. KASSON obtained the floor.

Mr. BROWWELL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for information. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. BIDWELL] has stated here that the evidence taken before his committee more than confirms the charges brought by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] against the Commissioner; that he wanted that evidence brought before the House; but that the committee does not desire to bring that evidence here, and several members of the committee have appeared before the House in vindication of the Commissioner. I would inquire now why that evidence is withheld from the House if these gentlemen really wish to vindicate the Commissioner of Agriculture, and the evidence taken tends to his exculpation?

Mr. KASSON. That is not a question addressed to the committee of which I am a member but to another committee, and I cannot answer it. I will yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] for a few moments.

Mr. STEVENS. I have but a word to say in relation to this matter. The appropriation asked for by the bureau was $90,000. The Committee on Appropriations reduced it to $80,000. By the vote taken here the other day, authorizing cereals to be collected in New York, I have no doubt but that the appropriation may be still further reduced $10,000. I have to say as to my district that we look upon this item of appropriation as of more value than all the rest of your legislation put together.

I do not care whether the Irish potato was raised originally in Pennsylvania or not, but I should like some gentleman who is wiser than Mr. Newton to tell me where it did originate. I do not think my learned friend from Ohio (Mr. DELANO) or anybody else can tell us as to that. I believe it originated in the West Indies or in Pennsylvania; but I say that the ignorance of the Commissioner of Agriculture on that subject is an ignorance in common with every member of this House. Nobody knows any better.

Mr. DELANO. Did the gentleman ever hear that it originated in Pennsylvania?

Mr. STEVENS. I think so. I believe it was alleged long ago that it originated somewhere in the lower part of the State.

Now, sir, all I have to say is, that we are not trying the head of this bureau. These appropriations are for carrying on the Department. If the present head of the bureau is not a proper man for the place, let us take the proper means to get a proper man put there; but do not let us strike down the Department. I do not wonder at the course of the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. MORRILL,) who has always opposed these agricultural appropriations. What use are they to people up there in Vermont? Can you sow seeds upon rocks and stones? I know that these appropriations are not useful there, and I am not surprised at the opposition which my friend has made to them from the beginning; but, depend upon it, if the people want anything at our hands it is the continuation of this agricultural appropriation and the dissemination of these seeds. There may be some worthless things distributed. There always will be under such circumstances.

As I said before, I did not rise to defend the integrity of this officer. That I believe is above reproach. His energy is beyond doubt. His science is not in question here. I believe that he has infused more vigor into this bureau since he has been there than any scientific man would have done bending over his crucibles night and day. He is a man of business; but we are not trying him. If you want to try him go before the proper tribunal; but give the appropriation necessary to carry on his office. What kind of legislation would it be for us to withhold the appropriations for the Army and Navy because we do not like the heads of those Departments?

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House debate is now closed on this paragraph.

The question was upon the pending amendment, to strike out the word "eighty" and insert "forty-five," so that the clause, if amended, will read as follows:

For purchase of cereal, vegetable, and flower seeds, and for labor in putting up seeds, seed-bags, and miscellaneous items, $45,000.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$45,000" and inserting "$60,000." That was the sum I originally moved.

The question was taken upon the amendment to the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the amendment; and upon a division, there were—ayes 21, noes 86.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend by striking out "$80,000" and inserting "$90,000," the amount estimated for by the head of the Bureau of Agriculture. I think, after the debate which we have had here, we should appropriate the amount asked for.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope this item will be left as the committee reported it, although the original estimate was cut down $10,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. Very well. I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move to amend this clause by adding the following:

Provided further, That $10,000 of the foregoing ap- propriation be used for the purchase of the Glover museum, and $3,000 for the capture and experiment in the domestication of the American fur-bearing animals: And provided further, That the Commissioner shall, on or before the 15th day of December of each year hereafter, make a report in detail to Congress of the moneys expended by him.

Mr. KASSON. I ask for a division of the amendment; and that the vote be first taken upon the appropriation for the Glover museum.

The question was accordingly stated to be upon the following clause:

Provided further That $10,000 of the foregoing appropriation be used for the purchase of the Glover museum.

Mr. BIDWELL. I move to amend this clause by inserting before "$10,000" the words "not exceeding."

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I accept that amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by striking out the words "and $3,000 for the capture and experiment in the domestication of the American fur-bearing animals."

Mr. KASSON. I would inquire if the question, under my call for a division, is not now upon the item in relation to the purchase of the Glover museum?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the first question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope that we may have some explanation of what the Glover museum is.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not now in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to any debate.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the first clause of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN AERNAM] by striking out the words "of the foregoing appropriation," so as to make this an independent appropriation.

The question was taken upon the amendment to the first clause of the amendment; and there were, upon a division—ayes 48, noes 16; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. KASSON and Mr. BIDWELL to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 67, noes 35.

So the amendment to the first clause of the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the clause as amended; and upon a division, there were—ayes 48, noes 41; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, and Mr. COOK, to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 58, noes 39.

So the clause, as amended, was agreed to.

The question again recurred upon the next clause of the amendment offered by Mr. VAN AERNAM, as follows:

And $3,000 for the capture and experiment in the domestication of the American fur-bearing animals: And provided further, That the Commissioner shall, on or before the 15th day of December of each year hereafter, make a report in detail to Congress of the moneys expended by him.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend by adding the following:

Provided further, That no portion of this appropriation need be expended in the capture and domestication of the fur-bearing animal known as the polecat. [Laughter.]

Mr. KUYKENDALL. Is that the right name?

The amendment of Mr. BENJAMIN was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the second clause of the amendment of Mr. VAN AERNAM.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I hope the committee will give me the privilege of making a brief explanation of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. As I am not permitted to make a word of explanation, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot do that now, as the committee have already acted upon a portion of the amendment.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask for a division of the question, and that it be first taken upon the portion of the amendment relating to fur-bearing animals.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not susceptible of division.

Mr. BROOMALL. Is it in order to move to strike out the portion relating to fur-bearing animals?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BROOMALL. Then I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words; "and $3,000 for the capture and experiment in the domestication of American fur-bearing animals;" so that the amendment will read:

And provided further, That the Commissioner shall, on or before the 15th day of December in each year hereafter, make a report in detail to Congress of all moneys expended by him.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Chairman, what has become of the amendment in regard to polecats?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been voted down.

Mr. NIBLACK. I only desired to suggest that the polecat is not a fur-bearing, but a far-smelling animal. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOMALL's amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read the following:

For propagation and distribution of plants, cuttings, and shrubs, $14,000: Provided, That the propagation of plants, cuttings, and shrubs shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

For experimental garden in reservation No. 2, $8,800.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by adding after the clause just read the following:

And it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to make distribution of seeds directly from the Agricultural Department, and not through members of Congress.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order. Debate has been closed on the whole paragraph.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes eleven; noes not counted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I see that most of the members want to electioneer with these seeds. [Laughter.]

Mr. DELANO. I now offer the amendment I have already indicated. I move to amend by adding after the clause just read the following:

Provided, That no money shall hereafter be paid to the present Commissioner on account of his salary except so much as may be due for past services.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes ten; noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mint at Philadelphia:

For salaries of the director, treasurer, assayer, melter and refiner, chief coinier and engraver, assistant assayer, and seven clerks, $36,500.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out the last word.

I offer this amendment for the purpose of making an inquiry. I see that in addition to the appropriation contained in this clause, there is another clause beginning on line eight hundred and forty-six, which reads: "For additional salary of the treasurer of the Mint at Philadelphia, $1,500. I desire to know what is the salary of these officers as fixed by law, and whether the additional salary is authorized by law."

Mr. KASSON. This bill provides for no increase of salary whatever. By action during the last Congress, or perhaps during the last session of the present Congress, the salary was fixed by law. The "additional salary" is a technical phrase, having relation to certain additional duties which have been imposed on these officers by law.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would like the gentleman to state what the additional salary is.

Mr. KASSON. Without referring to the book, I think the salary is $4,000, and what is technically called the "additional salary" is an allowance, I believe, of $500, made in pursuance of a law imposing additional duties.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read the following:

For additional salary of the treasurer of the Mint at Philadelphia, $1,500.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend by striking out the clause just read. I differ with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] in regard to the construction of the law. I say that, whatever may be the salary of this treasurer this bill adds to it $1,500.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that this point has been distinctly made, for I have here the law which establishes the salary of this officer. It was passed on the 7th of April, 1866, and will be found in the laws of the last session.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will ask what the salary of this officer is now by law.

Mr. KASSON. Forty-five hundred dollars.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the present salary is $4,500, this makes it $6,000.

Mr. KASSON. I mean $4,500 exclusive of this. The regular appropriation was formerly $4,500. This "additional salary" was added by the law of last session. The gentleman's proposition is to repeal the law of last session.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. No, sir; my proposition is this, and I defy the gentleman to controvert it: that there is an existing law fixing the salary of the treasurer of the Mint at Philadelphia, and this appropriation, which the gentleman proposes to pass, adds that much to it.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman desires it, and the committee will wait, I will send for the law. The salary is fixed at $6,000, and this is for the additional $1,500 fixed by law. If the gentleman turns back he will find we appropriate for the treasurer of the Mint instead of the Director which I had in my mind; for the treasurer it was $3,500, and this is an additional salary for the treasurer of the Mint $1,500, making the total $5,000 instead of $6,000.

I will refer to the law. It is section fourteen of the general law of last session. It provides that from and after the 1st day of April, 1866, there shall be paid, instead of the yearly salaries at present authorized to the Director, &c.—to the treasurer, $6,500, and $1,500 for additional compensation as Assistant Treasurer of the United States. And so it is with all the others. My first statement, then, is correct: his salary as treasurer of the Mint is $3,500, and his salary as Assistant Treasurer of the United States, the duties of which office you imposed upon him by law, is $1,500 a year additional.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That does not conform to the text of the bill. Here the provision is for additional salary to the treasurer of the Mint. I say this is adding $1,500 to that man's salary.

Mr. KASSON. I must call the gentleman's attention to the mistake which he makes. This provides for the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at this place, as the treasurer of the Mint acts as Assistant Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. THAYER. Is there not a Treasurer of the United States at Philadelphia, and what occasion is there for the treasurer of the Mint to act as Assistant Treasurer of the United States? If there be necessity for it, then it is all well enough.

Mr. KASSON. I do not rise to discuss the laws of the last Congress, and while I say this is carrying out existing law, it is not proper to introduce into this bill any general legislation.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This is to strike out general legislation, for this provision is to increase by indirection the salary of a public officer who is already getting too large a salary.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I should like to hear some reason why Philadelphia is selected for this curtailment of salary? All should be stricken out if it be stricken out in this case. I hope no discrimination will be made of this character, but that the bill will be allowed to remain as reported. And I hope therefore the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will be voted down.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes fifteen, noes not counted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, and Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 63.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional salary of the treasurer of the branch Mint at New Orleans, $500.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to strike that out.

Mr. KASSON. It is provided by the same law of Congress. There is no increase of appropriation.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Iowa what this $500 will make the whole salary?

Mr. KASSON. The amount provided by existing laws. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What is that?

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will give me time to refer to the original law I will answer him; I do not carry it in my mind.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will modify my motion, instead of striking out to add the following proviso:

Provided, This shall not be considered as additional salary to the one now provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional salary of the treasurer of the branch mint at Denver, $500.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to add the same proviso.

Mr. KASSON. If that is to be adopted, I ask the gentleman to change the language so as to provide that it is not an increase of the salary now provided by law.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will agree to that if you will let me go back and move the same amendment to the paragraph concerning the treasurer of the Mint.

Mr. STEVENS. I object to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional salary of the treasurer of the branch mint at San Francisco, California, $1,500.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move the same amendment.

Mr. KASSON. With the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] I propose that a clause shall be inserted which we will draw and send to the Clerk, providing what I have already stated as the intention of the bill, that this shall not be construed as an increase of salary.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is all I desire.

Mr. BIDWELL. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I shall have to insist on taking the vote on my amendment.

Mr. BIDWELL. I object to any decrease of compensation.

Mr. KASSON. This is neither a decrease nor an increase, but for the purpose of satisfying the views of the gentleman from Illinois. I propose to insert a clause declaring that there shall be no actual increase by this bill.

Mr. BIDWELL. Is this to carry out an existing law?

Mr. KASSON. It is.

The amendment of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, was accordingly withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of additional clerks in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at Philadelphia, $6,585.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend by adding at the end of the foregoing clause these words:

And $5,000 for an increase of the salaries of clerks, additional clerks, messengers, and watchmen in the said office, each from 20 to 25 per cent.

Those employed in the Assistant Treasurer's office have very responsible positions. They perform the duties of clerks and other important duties, and are really not paid as they should be. They are selected for their capacity, integrity, and fidelity, and I know the compensation paid them is not what is paid by private employers to such clerks, messengers, and watchmen as they are. The very best men are required by the Government in these places, and the only way to get them is to give them proper compensation. I hope the committee will adopt my amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I will state to the gentleman that during either the last session or the session of the preceding Congress the compensation of these persons at the mints was provided for by making some increase. That was as far as the committee were willing to go, and we are certainly not willing to go further in this bill.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of additional clerks and additional compensation of officers and clerks, under act of August 6, 1846, for the better organization of the Treasury, at such rates as the Secretary may deem just and reasonable, $60,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire some information from the gentleman who has charge of this bill in regard to this item—$60,000 to be paid out "at such rates as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem just and reasonable."

Mr. KASSON. This is the usual clause in all the appropriation bills for the administration of the duties imposed by Congress upon the Secretary of the Treasury in this respect by the original sub-Treasury act.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. "At such rates as he may deem just?"

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir. It was in the same language last year and the year before, and the amount is identical with that heretofore introduced in these appropriation bills.

Mr. HILL. I move to strike out the entire clause. I do it for the reason that I think the facts do not justify the placing of any more money at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury. I am unable to see why, if it is done in this case, it may not with equal propriety be done with regard to the heads of other Departments. We have been appropriating from time to time, I am quite sure, something like a million of dollars, if not more, in different sums, to be distributed at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to persons in the employ of that Department. By a report recently made it appears that that money has been distributed among his favorites upon the principle that "to him that hath shall be given and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." I find by the report contained in executive document No. 22 a statement showing that out of the $160,000 appropriated at the last session, one assistant secretary received $250 per quarter increase, being at the rate of $1,000 per year. And I find $375 per quarter appropriated to each of the two comptrollers, being at the rate of $1,500 a year increase. And now it is proposed to give this sum of $60,000 to be distributed in the same way.

It occurs to me that it was not in accordance with the intention of Congress in appropriating these sums; that the design of Congress in making the appropriation was to give to those who needed these sums of money, those not receiving a high rate of compensation from the Government, instead of placing these high salaried officers of the Department upon a vastly better footing than similar officers in any other Department. Under this provision, and the distribution of this sum heretofore by the Secretary of the Treasury, you have given to the officers of that Department, receiving salaries of $2,500 and more, an addition of from one thousand to fifteen hundred dollars, while you have not made such increase to similar officers in the Interior Department, in the State Department, and in other Departments where equal skill is certainly required, and where equal compensation should be paid for equally valuable services. This is an indirect way of increased salaries for which the law has made no provision, leaving the matter in the discretion of the head of the Department. I move to strike out this clause, because in my opinion no good reason exists for placing this money in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be distributed at his direction, that would not operate equally in favor of any other Department; and, as Congress has not extended a like liberality in regard to the other Departments, I insist that it should cease in regard to this one.

Mr. KASSON. My friend from Indiana entirely mistakes the object of the clause appropriating this money. It has no relation whatever to the distribution to which he has referred. The Committee on Appropriations is as much opposed as he is to a continuance of that system, but this does not relate to the clerks in the Treasury Department. It is for the services of clerks employed in the business of the sub-Treasurers over various parts of the United States, which the law cannot foresee sufficiently to make a specific classification of the clerks or a specific appropriation for their salaries. We have consequently adopted in the past this policy of placing money for this purpose in the hands of the head of the Treasury Department. I shall heartily coöperate with my friend in opposing any restoration of that system of distributing extra pay to which he has alluded; but this appropriation is necessary to carry on the current operations of the Department, and is entirely distinct from the matter to which he has referred.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would ask the member from Iowa if this clause does not provide for additional compensation to officers and clerks, and if it would not place it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to allow an increase of compensation.

Mr. KASSON. It follows the language of the acts heretofore passed on the subject, and it is not intended, nor has it the effect, of increasing salaries at all.

Mr. BROMWELL. What salaries would it increase, or what salaries does it contemplate?

Mr. KASSON. It is not contemplated to increase any salaries. The clause adopts the language of former laws, and carries out the system which we have followed from year to year in reference to these officers. I assure the gentleman that there is no such increase as he supposes contemplated.

Mr. BROMWELL. It seems to me that this clause conveys an implied authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to allow increased compensation to officers of that Department.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to my colleague that he move to strike out the words "at such rates as the Secretary may deem just and reasonable," so that these salaries shall be paid in accordance with existing law, without leaving the matter at the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection to that if the gentleman will say that these men shall be paid at the existing rates, or will use some such phrase as that.

Mr. BROMWELL. I do not see how additional compensation can be paid at the existing rates.

Mr. KASSON. I have not the original law before me, but I will say to my friend from Illinois that the word "additional" used in this clause is copied from the existing law. Some questions in relation to this matter were put in the House last session; the law was then referred to, and the explanations made were deemed satisfactory by the House.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will read the clause, and I think the gentleman will see that my objection to it is well taken:

For salaries of additional clerks and additional compensation of officers and clerks, under act of August 6, 1846, for the better organization of the Treasury, at such rates as the Secretary may deem just and reasonable, $60,000.

It seems to me that the Secretary might draw from that authority to take the $60,000, or some portion of it, and give it to such clerks in his Department as he may deem it just and reasonable to pay it to.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman is in error in regard to the application of the words "at such rates as the Secretary may deem just and reasonable," if he supposes they are intended to have the effect he has indicated. The amount to be hereby appropriated is to meet the existing rates of compensation of these officers and clerks named in the original law. The limit we place upon the Secretary of the Treasury is in regard to the amount of the appropriation. We have no design to enlarge either the discretion or the amount. These clerks are already employed, and this amount is to pay them.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HILL. I withdraw my amendment in order to enable other gentlemen who may desire to debate an opportunity to offer amendments.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend this clause by striking out the words "and additional compensation of officers and clerks." If that amendment shall prevail, I will then move to further amend the clause by striking out the words "at such rates as the Secretary may deem just and reasonable." The clause would then read as follows:

For salaries of additional clerks, under act of August 6, 1846, for the better organization of the Treasury, $60,000.

That leaves the appropriation as it now stands, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] says it is necessary to fulfill the requirements of the existing law. I am opposed to these additional compensations. I prefer that the compensation should be fixed by law, and then we will all know what it is, and what amount is to be appropriated. As this now reads it seems to me to give a great deal of discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury in this matter.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will.

Mr. HILL. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] as well as of the Committee of the Whole, to the fact that the language used in this clause is precisely the language of the law which authorized the distribution of the money reported to this House. The Secretary in his report makes this statement, quoting from the law:

"For compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to officers and clerks in the same Department."

The language of the clause now under consideration is as follows:

For salaries [instead of "compensation," as in the existing law] of additional clerks and additional compensation of officers and clerks."

That is precisely the language used in the act under which the $160,000 was appropriated, and under which the Secretary has distributed that money to the heads of the bureaus.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Except that this section limits the appropriation of this money to the classes specified in the act of August 6, 1846.

Mr. HILL. I have not the act of 1846 now before me.

Mr. THAYER. This clause does not limit the discretion of the Secretary in the distribution of the money.

Mr. STEVENS. We passed an act last year appropriating $160,000, and an act the year before appropriating $250,000, to be distributed at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, which discretion he most shamefully abused.

Mr. HILL. I agree with the gentleman there.

Mr. STEVENS. He gave the money to those who did not need it, and kept it from those who did need it. He asked this year for the same amount, $160,000, every dollar of which the Committee on Appropriations struck out, and no part of it, therefore, is included in this bill. This $60,000 is for the clerks authorized under the law of 1846. That law, I think, created sub-Treasuries and authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to employ clerks at his own discretion for that purpose. Those clerks have been employed, but none of them have their salaries fixed, except so far as they have been fixed by the discretion of the Secretary under the law of 1846. This appropriation is to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay these clerks as he has paid them heretofore; it does not allow him any discretion whatever.

Mr. THAYER. I would inquire if the act of 1846 does not classify the clerks and fix their pay according to certain classes?

Mr. STEVENS. I have not the law before me; but my impression is that that was left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to another thing. This clause reads "additional compensation of officers and clerks," it does not say "clerks" simply.

Mr. STEVENS. We have used the same language here which we have always used in appropriation bills.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It seems to me to be very evident that the effect of this clause which we are now discussing is to give additional compensation to the clerks; and it allows the Secretary of the Treasury a very wide discretion in fixing their rates of compensation as "he may deem just and reasonable." Now, I think we better fix the salaries ourselves, and not leave the matter to the discretion of anybody. I should like to see the law of 1846 so as to know whether there is vested in the Secretary of the Treasury any such discretion to fix the additional salaries of clerks. That is not the way Congress formerly legislated. It may have done so in that particular case.

Mr. KASSON. Since 1846 the enlargement of the operations of the Treasury Department has rendered it necessary from time to time to increase the number of clerks, and the provision for their compensation has been continued from year to year in the form now proposed in this bill. I will read a portion of the thirteenth section of the sub-Treasury act, showing how this matter started in the early days of the sub-Treasury:

"That said officers respectively, whose duty it is made by this act to receive, keep, and disburse the public moneys as the fiscal agents of the Government, may be allowed any necessary additional expense for clerks, fire-proof chests or vaults, &c., or any other necessary expenses of safe-keeping, transferring, and disbursing said moneys; all such expenses of every character to be first expressly authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, whose directions upon all the above subjects by way of regulation and otherwise, so far as authorized by law are to be strictly followed by all the said officers."

And it was provided that the number of clerks should not exceed those named at that time, nor their pay at that time exceed $800 each. Since that time the enlargement of the operations of the Department has rendered necessary a very large increase in the number of clerks, as everybody knows, and the language in which the appropriations have been made has been continued in this way. The limitation imposed by Congress upon the Secretary is found in the amount appropriated, namely, $60,000, which is necessary for the payment of the existing force at the existing rates. This is the same amount which was appropriated last year.

I will only add that we cannot, without further facts than we now have before us, specify the number of clerks or the rates at which they shall be paid, classifying them properly. I should be very glad to do this if it were possible; and I trust that by the time another bill shall be introduced we may have from the Secretary of the Treasury a statement of the number of clerks employed and their respective compensation, so that we may impose a limitation in accordance with the existing condition of facts. We have not, however, at present such a knowledge of the facts as would enable us safely to undertake any legislation of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BENJAMIN, there were—ayes 37, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I trust the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] if he does not wish to break up the committee for want of a quorum, will let this question go into the House.

Mr. KASSON. If the question can be passed in any way I am willing that the vote shall be reserved till the bill comes before the House. That will give us an opportunity meanwhile to obtain the information which some gentlemen desire.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest that we pass this paragraph informally, with the understanding that we may return to its consideration hereafter.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BENJAMIN. No, sir; I insist on a vote upon it.

No quorum having voted, the Chairman, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. BENJAMIN and LE BLOND.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 29; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, had come to no resolution thereon.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill extending the provisions of the pension laws; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

And then, on motion of Mr. LE BLOND, (at fifteen minutes of four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of Steven Hefington, and 160 others, loyal citizens of Parker county, Texas, asking for protection and relief from rebel rule.

By Mr. BUNDY: The petition of Leo Ebert, John Burgess, and 15 others, citizens of Lawrence county, Ohio, asking that the present tax on cigars be changed to a specific tax.

By Mr. DAVIS: The petition of R. M. Gere, Robert Gere, W. H. H. Gere, and 12 others, citizens of Geddes, New York, against legislation to reduce the amount of circulating notes, and against compelling all national banks to redeem their circulation in the city of New York.

By Mr. DONNELLY: The petition of William A. Jackson, and others, citizens of Maple Plain, Hennepin county, Minnesota, in favor of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to give Congress the power to control the question of suffrage in the States of the Union; also, that Congress prohibit any inequality as to suffrage in the Territories by reason of race, color, or place of birth.

By Mr. GRISWOLD: The petition of a large number of wool-growers of Washington county, New York, for protection against importation of foreign wools.

By Mr. HARDING, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Moline, Illinois, for preservation of the national currency and against requiring redemption for national bank notes in New York.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut: The petition of Chauncey Peck, and others, soldiers of the war of 1812, asking pensions.

By Mr. JULIAN: The petition of 71 citizens of Blackfoot county, Indiana, praying an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, so that no inequality shall prevail among citizens on account of birth, race, color, previous inequality, or previous non-residence beyond the preceding year.

By Mr. KOONTZ: The petition of citizens of Schellensburg and Bedford, in the county of Bedford, in the State of Pennsylvania, against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or compelling national banks to redeem their circulating notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio: The petition of citizens of Urbana, against a reduction of greenback currency.

Also, the memorial of Bellefontaine Temple No. 22, of Ohio, for an amendment to the Constitution rendering ineligible to election or appointment to any office any person habitually addicted to the use of alcoholic stimulants.

By Mr. MOULTON: The petition of citizens of Rosemond, Christian county, Illinois, against any curtailment of the currency.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The petition of George Fendrick, and others, of Vincennes, Indiana, praying for a reduction of taxes on cigars.

Also, the petition of George Caxson, and others, of Evansville, Indiana, praying for a reduction of taxes on cigars.

By Mr. ORTH: The petition of numerous citizens of Indiana and Illinois, on the subject of reconstruction.

Also, the petition of Captain Thomas W. Fry, of Indiana, asking for relief.

By Mr. PLANTS: The petition of Jacob Miller, and 12 others, cigar manufacturers and dealers and growers of tobacco in Washington county, Ohio, asking for such changes in the internal revenue law as will prevent frauds, and equalize the burdens upon the various qualities of tobacco manufacture.

By Mr. ROGERS: The petition of J. L. Curtis, Joseph Lepine, George H. Terey, citizens of Morris-town, New Jersey, manufacturers of cigars, relative to the present duty on foreign and domestic cigars.

By Mr. ROLLINS: The petition of S. D. Downs, and 45 others, citizens of Franconstown, Hillsborough county, New Hampshire, for a new post route between Franconstown and New Boston in said county.

Also, the petition of Joseph B. Walker and Nathaniel Bouton, officers of the New Hampshire Historical Society, for change in postage laws, so as to permit postage on pamphlets, papers, documents, and books forwarded to such societies and public libraries to be paid on delivery, and that the postage thereon be reduced fifty per cent.

Also, a petition of Weymouth Bean, of Upper Gilmanton, New Hampshire, for pension, he having lost two sons by the war, one in battle, the other by disease contracted in the service.

Also, the petition of Charles A. Hackett, and 19 others, citizens of Upper Gilmanton, in aid of the petition of said Weymouth Bean.

Also, the petition of 110 citizens of Georgia and other States, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so that there shall be no inequality among citizens on account of birth, race, color, previous inequality, or previous non-residence beyond the preceding year, and for removal by immediate legislation of any such inequality from the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the ten unreturned States, and for taking necessary measures for peace, order, justice, and the security of life, liberty, and property in the same.

By Mr. SITGREAVES: The petition from the Union Republican Central Committee, of the city of Elizabeth, New Jersey, for a separate port of entry, and appointment of a collector at that place, &c.

By Mr. TROWBRIDGE: The petition of William Livingston, of the city of Detroit, Michigan, asking for authority to enroll the steam-tug John S. Noyes, a Canadian vessel, in the coasting trade of the United States.

By Mr. WARD, of New York: The petition of numerous citizens of Greenwood, Steuben county, New York, for the increase of the tariff on wool.

By Mr. WARNER: The petition of B. G. Warner, and others, manufacturers of cigars, praying for a change of ad valorem to specific tax on imported cigars.

Also, the petition of Charles Parker, for release of manufacturers of hardware from internal revenue tax on hardware.

Also, the petition of Benjamin Douglass, and others, for a can buoy and a spar buoy at the mouth of the Connecticut river.

By Mr. WENTWORTH: The petition of citizens of Illinois, for increased duties upon wool.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 14, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of Friday last.

Mr. WADE. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Nobody is listening to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be dispensed with by the unanimous consent of the Senate. No objection being made, the further reading of the Journal is dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 4th of December, information in relation to the amount of money paid or ordered to be paid since the 18th day of May last to the several newspapers printed and published in the District of Columbia for advertising notices and proposals for each of the Executive Departments of the Government, and the number and character of the advertisements for which said money was paid; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying that a duty of thirty cents per bushel may be imposed on imported flaxseed; which was ordered to lie on the table, the subject having been reported upon by the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which was ordered to lie on the table, the bill having been reported by the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of forty officers of the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Daviess county, Kentucky, praying that Amos Metcalfe may be compensated for services rendered while in the United States service, and that he may be remunerated for losses incurred by him during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented three petitions of citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against the restoration of any State that rebelled against the United States Government until security is obtained against a renewed attempt to secede, against any payment of the rebel debt, and against any distinction in its constitution on account of color or descent; which were referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

He also presented three petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying for such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will prohibit any inequality in the laws of any State on account of birth, race, or color; which were referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. GRIMES presented the memorial of the city council of Burlington, Iowa, praying that a certain lot of public land within the corporate limits of that city may be granted to the city for educational purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the memorial of the board of public schools of the city of Burlington, Iowa, praying that a lot of public land in that city may be granted to the city for educational purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of cigar manufacturers of the eighth collection district of Massachusetts, praying that a specific tax of five dollars per thousand may be imposed on all domestic cigars in lieu of the present tax, and that the present tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged; that the cost of internal revenue stamps to cigar manufacturers may be limited to five dollars per thousand, and that the penalty for violations of the internal revenue laws may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Georgia, praying that the Constitution of the United States may be so amended as to prohibit any State from making any distinction in its laws among citizens thereof on account of race or color; which was referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

He also presented eight petitions of citizens of the United States, praying for such an amendment of the Constitution as will prohibit any distinction being made in the laws of any State among the citizens thereof on account of race or color; which were referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the petition of citizens of Arkansas, in which they earnestly pray that Congress will ignore and set aside all the State governments established or controlled by traitors and such as are the determined enemies of our Government, and that Congress, with the least possible delay, will restore those States and State governments into the hands of the loyal citizens, to whom they respectively belong. I take it that the prayer of this petition presents the most practical question which is now before Congress, which is the setting aside of these rebel governments; and I trust that the committee to whom these petitions are referred will give us the benefit of a report very soon. I ask its reference to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

It was so referred.

Mr. RIDDLE presented a petition of cigar manufacturers, praying that a specific tax of five dollars per thousand may be imposed on all domestic cigars in lieu of the present tax, and that the present tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged; that the cost of internal revenue stamps to cigar manufacturers may be limited to five dollars per thousand, and that the penalty for violations of the internal revenue may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POLAND presented resolutions of the Farmers' Club of Windsor county, Vermont, and resolutions of the Farmers' Club of Springfield, Vermont, in favor of an increase of the duty on foreign wool; which were ordered to lie on the table, the Committee on Finance having reported on the subject.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of an appropriation of lands to perfect the navigation of the Mississippi river to the falls of St. Anthony; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWARD presented the memorial of Rev. W. H. Furness, George Cadwalader, Daniel Smith, jr., and other citizens of Philadelphia, praying for the repeal of the law which retires officers of the Army at a certain age, and that no retirement may be made without the report of a board of examination; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CATTELL presented five petitions of manufacturers and operatives of Manayunk, in the twenty-first ward of the city of Philadelphia, praying for the repeal of the internal revenue tax levied on all goods manufactured; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CATTELL. I also present the petition of seven hundred and fifty employes of the glass-ware manufactories of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and Wheeling, West Virginia, asking for a further increase of the tariff on imported glass-ware in order that their labor may be protected. I have only to add that the evidence which this paper contains, that it has been handled by the operatives themselves, rather beautifies than mars it in my opinion. As the Committee on Finance have reported on this subject, I move that the petition be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented a petition of journeymen cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars of Evansville, Indiana, praying for a specific duty of five dollars per thousand on domestic cigars, and that the present tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged, and that Congress will alter the present system of stamping by selling the stamps to the manufacturers at five dollars per thousand, and increase the penalty for violating the revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PATTERSON presented two memorials of citizens of Louisiana, praying for an appropriation to aid in repairing and rebuilding the State levees on the banks of the Mississippi and other rivers in that State, and for the proper supervision thereof by the appointment of a board of levee commissioners jointly by the President of the United States and the Governor of Louisiana; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of citizens of Wisconsin, remonstrating against the restoration of the States lately in rebellion until adequate security is obtained against a renewed attempt to secede, against any payment of the rebel debt or for emancipated slaves, and against any distinction in State laws among citizens thereof on account of color or descent; which was referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. SHERMAN presented ten petitions of citizens of the United States, praying for a duty of thirty cents per bushel on flaxseed; which were ordered to lie on the table, the Committee on Finance having reported on the subject.

He also presented four petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie on the table, the bill having been reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of officers of the United States Army, praying Congress to rescind the section of the Army bill passed at the last session which abolishes regimental bands; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I present the petition of John Hinde, and others, citizens of Ohio, in relation to flax manufactures, in which they say that in their opinion "none of the various articles of flax manufactures are sufficiently protected by existing laws, especially the different kinds of twines and yarns." They further say:

"They would also represent that in their opinion the interests of the country would be advanced by the addition of duty upon all hemp, jute, or flax, twines, and yarns, and also upon all twine and yarn made from the tow of hemp, jute, or flax, and imported from foreign countries, and which inferior articles, on account of price and appearance, come in competition with American products."

As this matter has been considered by the Committee on Finance, I move that the petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or having in view the return within a limited time to specie payments, and against compelling all national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting national banks from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of file manufacturers of Providence, Rhode Island, remonstrating against any advance in the duty on steel; which was ordered to lie on the table, the Committee on Finance having reported on the subject.

He also presented five petitions of citizens of the State of New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie on the table, the bill having been reported by the Committee on Finance.

He also presented ten memorials of manufacturers of wool and of constructors of burring machines, remonstrating against an extension of the letters-patent of Stephen R. Parkhurst, dated May 1, 1845; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. YATES presented a petition of citizens of Illinois, praying for an increase of the duty on foreign wool; which was ordered to lie on the table, the subject having been reported upon by the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Illinois, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table, the bill having been reported by the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of the Illinois State Association of Teachers, praying for the establishment of a national Educational Bureau; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of female employes in the folding-room of the Government Printing Office, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COWAN presented the memorial of citizens of Iowa, and the memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or a return within a limited time to specie payments, and against compelling all banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting national banks from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented twelve petitions of manufacturers of cotton and woolen fabrics, praying for a modification of the internal revenue laws by removing the five per cent. tax on goods, the allowance of a drawback of three cents per pound on cotton to be refunded to the manufacturer, and the imposition of a tax on all articles of luxury not produced in the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DIXON presented two petitions of journeymen cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars in Connecticut, praying for a specific tax of five dollars per thousand on domestic cigars, and that the present tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged, and that Congress alter the present system of stamping by selling the stamps to the manufacturers at five dollars per thousand, and increase the penalty for violating the revenue laws; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that it had passed the bill (S. No. 383) for the relief of Lewis Dyer, late surgeon of the eighty-first regiment Illinois volunteers; and also that it had passed the bill (S. No. 218) exempting the property of debtors in the District of Columbia from levy, attachment, or sale on execution, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 457) for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 488) for the relief of Norman J. Hall;

A bill (H. R. No. 916) for the relief of James M. Bishop, who claims $236;

A bill (H. R. No. 974) to indemnify Abial Morrison for property destroyed by hostile Indians in Washington Territory in the years 1855 and 1856;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service at Washington; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 235) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 383) for the relief of Lewis Dyer, late surgeon of the eighty-first regiment Illinois volunteers; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. Moore, his Secretary, announced that he approved and signed on the 11th instant the joint resolution (S. R. No. 154) to provide for the exhibition of the cereal productions of the United States at the Paris Exposition in April next, and on the 15th instant the bill (S. No. 459) suspending the payment of money from the Treasury as compensation to persons claiming the service or labor of colored volunteers or drafted men, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 457) for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral United States Navy—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 483) for the relief of Norman J. Hall—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 916) for the relief of James M. Bishop, who claims $236—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 974) to indemnify Abial Morrison for property destroyed by hostile Indians in Washington Territory in the years 1855 and 1856—to the Committee on Claims.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service at Washington—to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 285) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Mary J. Dixon, of Alexandria, Virginia, praying for the restoration of property sold for taxes, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 503) for the relief of Mrs. Mary J. Dixon, of Alexandria, in the State of Virginia, widow of the late Turner Dixon, deceased. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print extra copies of the memorial of the New England Emigrant Aid Company, praying for indemnification for the destruction of their property at Lawrence, Kansas, have instructed me to report it back adversely. It has not been the custom of the Senate to print memorials, and this memorial, which is one of some importance, has been once printed, and I presume there are on the files of the Senate as many copies as any Senators will require. The memorial should go to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered.

PENITENTIARIES IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 715) setting aside certain proceeds from internal revenue for the erection of penitentiaries in the Territories of Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota, have had it under consideration, and instructed me to report it back to the Senate with a recommendation that it pass; and if there be no objection I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to set aside and appropriate the net proceeds of the internal revenue of the Territories of Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota, for the fiscal years severally ending on the 30th of June, 1866, the 30th of June, 1867, and the 30th of June, 1868, for the purpose of erecting, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, penitentiary buildings in those Territories, at such places therein as have been or may be designated by the Legislatures thereof and approved by the Secretary of the Interior; but the moneys so set aside and appropriated in each of the Territories are to be devoted exclusively to the erection of a penitentiary in the Territory in which they have been and shall be collected, and not in any other; and that they shall not exceed in amount the sum of $20,000 in the Territory of Washington and $40,000 in each of the Territories of Nebraska, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 504) to improve the value of Government lands on the line of the McGregor Western railway, by aiding said railway company to construct said railroad; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 505) to quiet title to land in the town of Santa Clara, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolution, passed by the House of Representatives on Friday last:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses, namely:

RULE.—There shall be a joint committee on public buildings and grounds, to consist of five members on the part of the Senate and seven on the part of the House, whose duty it shall be to consider all subjects relating to the public edifices and grounds within the city of Washington which may be referred to them, and report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relating thereto as may seem to them expedient.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MRS. ELIZABETH R. SMITH.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 451.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 451) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth R. Smith was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate the sum of $2,468 in full payment and satisfaction of the claim of Mrs. Elizabeth R. Smith, widow of the late Lieutenant E. H. Smith, of the third regiment United States artillery, for property lost on board the steamer San Francisco, in the year 1853.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. LANE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 69, which has been up some four or five times; and I hope we shall dispose of it this morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions, the pending question being on the amendment moved by Mr. SUMNER, to add at the end of the House amendment the following additional section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That all other agents or officers appointed by the President or by the head of any Department, whose salary or compensation derived from fees or otherwise exceeds $1,000 annually, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the term of office of all such officers appointed since the 1st day of July, 1866, shall expire at the end of thirty days after the passage of this act: Provided, That this is not applicable to clerks of the Departments.

Mr. LANE. I just wish to say one or two words in reference to that matter. This is a bill to provide for the appointment of pension agents. It was well considered at the last session, and it has been well considered and debated at this session, and the Senate can vote knowingly, as it seems to me, in reference to all its provisions. Now, here is an amendment proposing to apply the same rule to all offices the salary attached to which is over $1,000 a year. While I sympathize with the object sought to be accomplished by the Senator from Massachusetts, I hope that that amendment will not be placed upon this bill, for it opens the whole subject of removals and appointments, and I very much fear that the bill will fail if this amendment be adopted. In consideration of the facts that this bill is well understood, has been thoroughly debated, and its whole scope and object known to the Senate, I hope that now no general proposition to apply the principle to all offices will be adopted as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Indiana says that the amendment which I have moved will open the whole question of the appointment and the removal of officers. Does not the original proposition reported by him do the same thing? Does it not open the whole question of appointment and removal? It seems to me that it does. The bill, I know, on its face is only applicable to pension agents; but in discussing that bill and in reaching your conclusion upon it, you are necessarily called upon to review the whole subject. If the bill is right with regard to pension agents, it is right with regard to other agents and officers of the Government. I see no reason why the President should have this peculiar power with regard to all other agents and officers of the Government and be deprived of it only in the case of pension agents. There is no single argument which my excellent friend from Indiana can adduce for his bill which is not equally and completely applicable to the amendment which I now propose. I should say myself that the occasion for the amendment which I have moved is, if possible, greater than the occasion for the original bill. There is more reason for it, inasmuch as the cases to which it is applicable are more numerous. The bill under consideration looks merely to one class of officers; my proposition looks to all classes of officers; and if there is a reason for protecting one class of officers, I insist that there is equal reason for protecting all these other classes of officers.

Now, sir, the Senator from Indiana wishes that this proposition should be postponed, or that it should come up separately, or that it should be moved on another bill. He has the natural desire, I know, which belongs to a Senator who has reported a bill to see his work perfected in the Senate. He wishes his bill passed as he reported it. I will not criticize the Senator for that desire, into which I know the chairmen of committees so naturally fall. It is natural that a Senator in his situation should press his own bill; but I now do appeal to the Senator from Indiana to take my amendment, not to oppose it. Let it go upon his bill, and let us give to the country as complete protection as we can, instead of simply giving protection to a single class of officers.

Mr. LANE. The reason assigned for objecting to this amendment is a reason which will strike the Senate. The facts in reference to the appointment of pension agents have been fully discussed. Their original appointment by the War Department, then by the Interior Department, then the proposition to give the power of appointment to the President, the number of agents, their compensation, the duration of the offices, have all been debated fully and freely before the Senate. Here now is a proposition to apply the same rule to all other offices the salary of which is over $1,000. As to the manner of their appointment, the duration of office, the compensation, and all these things, the Senate, if they vote upon the amendment, as it seems to me, must vote in ignorance of the facts. I think I should vote unhesitatingly for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts as a separate bill, or perhaps as an amendment upon some other bill. As I said before, I sympathize fully with the object sought to be accomplished by it; and if the amendment is engrafted upon this bill I shall still vote for the bill; but I prefer voting upon one thing at a time and upon a subject about which the Senate has been fully informed. I hope, therefore, that the Senator will forego the offering of his amendment upon this bill, and let us digest and adopt some general bill reaching all these offices. At present I know not how many officers would be embraced by the amendment; I know not what has been the manner of their appointment heretofore. I ask simply now that this measure, which has been fully debated, running through two sessions, shall be voted upon on its own merits. I have no objection to the amendment, and I think I should cheerfully vote for it as an independent proposition.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should think, sir, that there is more of principle and of rule in the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts than in the proposition of my colleague, although I shall not vote for either. My colleague says by his bill, which he now indorses, that pension agents have become important officers, but that some of them must go out of office if they were appointed after a certain day, and others who were appointed before that date shall hold office; so that the importance of the office under the Constitution depends upon the date of their commission. I am not able to see the principle that is involved in that. I shall not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, but he embraces the whole subject, and his particular proposition might upon principle be adopted instead of the bill of my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SUMNER. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senate would reflect that we have one bill before us which, if it becomes a law, will deny to the President the right to remove, without the consent of the Senate, officers who are appointed with the consent of the Senate. Now, to place the large class of officers referred to by this amendment under the protection of that law, it is manifestly necessary that this provision should be enacted into law, here or elsewhere, now or at some other time. There is no conceivable bill that I know of in which it could be more properly placed than the pending bill, and if we pass it now then the work will be done. If we put it off to another time we shall still have it to do, if it is to be done, and it stands a "right smart" chance of not being done at all. So I really hope the amendment will be adopted on the pending bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, and Williams—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cowan, Cragin, Dixon, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Nesmith, Patterson, Poland, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Van Winkle—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Cresswell, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Guthrie, Johnson, McDougall, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Trumbull, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—19.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives as it has been amended by the Senate.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. MORRILL. Do I understand that that vote passes the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does. The bill is now disposed of so far as the Senate is concerned.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I move to reconsider the vote last taken, and I will mention as a reason that my colleague [Mr. FESSENDEN] expressed an interest in this measure when it was before the Senate on a former occasion, and I know he still continues to take that interest in the measure.

The question being put on the motion to reconsider, a division was called for.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand that an appeal has been made by the Senator from Maine in behalf of his colleague, who is confined to his lodgings by sickness, and who feels a special interest in this bill. I have never yet heard of a case where an appeal of this kind was made that the Senate did not listen to it.

Mr. LANE. The Senator from Maine has been here three or four days when this subject has been under consideration. I know that I saw him in his seat during at least two days while it was before us.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator is mistaken. The last day this bill was under consideration the Senator from Maine was engaged in the room of the Committee on Finance in preparing the tariff bill, which I find on my table this morning, and he was sent for, but could not leave the room.

Mr. LANE. That may be, but I know he was here several days when the bill was under consideration.

Mr. GRIMES. He was sent for the last day it was before the Senate, but he could not come here. I sent for him myself.

Mr. CRAGIN. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Maine if his colleague expressed a desire to be present when this bill should be finally disposed of? I had a conversation with him and did not understand from him that he had any special wish in relation to it. He said he was opposed to the House amendment and in favor of the original bill as it was passed by the Senate; but he did not express any particular anxiety about it.

Mr. MORRILL. In reply to the Senator from New Hampshire I have to say that on a former occasion when this bill was up my colleague was obliged to be in the Supreme Court, and he called my attention to that fact, and expressed a desire to be present when the bill should be considered. That is the reason I called the attention of the Senate to the fact this morning. I know this morning that he is confined to his room by illness; and I should hope that, as the bill is not to go back to the House, at least this courtesy might be extended to my colleague.

Mr. LANE. I hope this motion to reconsider will not prevail. This bill was up at the last session, was debated three or four days, and passed by the Senate and sent to the other House. It has now been passed by the House of Representatives with an amendment. There has been a debate of three or four days on the amendment, and we have now reached an end and disposed of it. I hope that action will not be reconsidered. If we are to reconsider measures in this way there is no telling when we shall get through with them. I do not see any great importance in reconsidering this vote. I feel perhaps as little interest in the matter as anybody else; but I have watched this bill now through two sessions, and if this motion to reconsider be carried I shall consider my duty as discharged and my care of the bill as passed by entirely.

Mr. SUMNER. This bill is important, first in what it does, and secondly in what it does not. It does provide a rule in one case, but it miserably fails to provide a rule in the great and urgent classes of cases throughout the whole country. It is a bill specially to meet almost I may say a particular case, instead of a bill general to meet the interests of the whole country. And, sir, the Senate are called to act upon it merely at the last stage on a disagreement between the two Houses, when there is but one vote. On common occasions, I need not remind you that there are several votes. A bill is considered in committee and then in the Senate, and then again there is another vote on its final passage. There is nothing of that kind now. You act by a single vote. I mention these things as reasons, in addition to those which have been already assigned, why this vote should be reconsidered. I think it had better go over for another day, and let us look the bill more carefully in the face and see whether it is what under the circumstances we ought to pass.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Friday, which is the bill (S. No. 453) to regulate the tenure of offices.

Mr. POLAND. I gave notice on Friday that I should this morning ask the Senate to take up the bankrupt bill, passed by the House of Representatives at the last session, for consideration; but I do not desire to antagonize that bill with the one now before the Senate, and therefore I shall not move this morning to take up the bankrupt bill. But I desire that it may be understood that as soon as this bill is disposed of I shall move the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bankrupt bill. I apprehend that some of the Senators are more alarmed than is needful in reference to the length of time that will be consumed by that bill. I think we shall all agree that the bankrupt bill pending, if one is to be passed, is made very nearly as perfect as it can be. I merely desire to say that when this bill shall be disposed of I shall then ask that the bankrupt bill be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] to amend the amendment made by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole to this bill by striking out all of the third section after the word "thereafter," in the sixth line. The words to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to such office so vacant or temporarily filled as aforesaid, during such next session of the Senate, such office shall remain in abeyance; without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto, until the same shall be filled by appointment thereto, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and during such time all the powers and duties belonging to such office shall be exercised by such other officer as may by law exercise such powers and duties in case of a vacancy in such office.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As the Senator from Oregon has expressed to the Senate a hope that this amendment will not be adopted, I wish to ask him a practical question. What officer is authorized to exercise the powers and discharge the duties of an internal revenue collector in case of a vacancy in that office? I ask the question because that is an office which under this provision of the bill may become vacant, and if this bill becomes a law there will be no power to fill it during the recess of the Senate. I ask him the question simply as illustrative of perhaps a thousand other cases.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose each collector has a deputy, and if so the deputy would discharge the duties of the office, or whether that be so or not this provision, as those who framed the bill understand the Constitution, is in conformity with that instrument; but if it shall be necessary to make further provision in reference to any particular office it may be made by law; but this is adopted as a general rule. Where a nomination is made to the Senate by the President and the Senate do not concur in making an appointment during the session of the Senate, it is to be taken and considered as the joint judgment of the President and the Senate that the office shall not be filled in that way at that time; and the committee understand that when upon a nomination of the President, or upon repeated nominations of the President, the Senate decide not to advise and consent to that nomination, it is the judgment of the Senate that the office shall not then be filled; and that the President ought not, if the Senate adjourns, to have the power to override the judgment of the Senate by making an appointment upon his own motion, because it is the province of the Senate to decide that question.* They are in fact the electoral body, and they having so decided it is to be regarded as the judgment of the competent body that the office shall not be filled at that time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The question that is presented by this amendment is not the one suggested by the Senator from Oregon; and, if it be constitutionally possible, I have no objection to Congress providing that a person nominated for an office and rejected by the Senate shall not be appointed afterward in vacation by the President to the same office. I think the President ought not to disregard the expressed will of the Senate in reference to that officer, and I should not ask him to do so. I have no objection, then, if it can be done according to the Constitution, to such a provision.

But the question here is, whether in a case where the President and Senate have been unable to agree upon some man for an office and the Senate adjourns, the office shall remain vacant during the ensuing recess. That is the question: whether the President shall have power to appoint, not the rejected man, but anybody to the office; whether, as I said before, the office shall remain vacant, the interests of the people shall be neglected, because the President might appoint somebody not agreeable to the majority of Congress. That is the whole question.

There was force in the inquiry I put to the Senator from Oregon. He has assumed the championship of the bill by appealing to the Senate without assigning a reason not to vote for the amendment. Now, I want to know from him how the country is placed with regard to important offices where there is no person authorized by law to discharge the duties of the office if a vacancy occurs. The right of the President to fill the vacancy is taken away from him. How, then, practically, is the law to be executed? The Senator suggests that we must obey the Constitution whether there is practical inconvenience or not. I thought the constitutional question was discussed pretty fully the other day. It was conceded by the learned Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] that the precedents and practice of the Government were against the position assumed this morning by the Senator from Oregon. The Executive practice has been uniformly against it from the foundation of the Government. It has uniformly been in favor of the construction that in such a case the President could fill the vacancy; and I referred to two instances in which a legislative construction was placed upon this provision of the Constitution agreeing with the Executive construction; so that the authority upon the subject is altogether against the construction contended for by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think I sufficiently answered the question of the honorable Senator from Indiana, and I do not propose to discuss the merits of this bill upon this amendment. I think it is evident that if this part of the bill be stricken out it will be deprived altogether of its value and will amount to nothing, for it will then provide that if the President makes a nomination to the Senate and that nomination is rejected, then after the adjournment of the Senate the President can proceed to appoint an officer to fill the supposed vacancy, and so it recognizes in the President practically the absolute power of appointment without any regard to the judgment of the Senate. Suppose the President nominates a man to-day to fill an office now vacant, and the Senate rejects the nomination, and the President declines to make any further nomination, and the Senate adjourns. Then, according to the argument of the Senator, the President may fill that office; and so, if that be the policy, the President may ignore the existence of the Senate so far as appointments are concerned, and take the whole power into his own hands. This clause of the bill is intended to strip him of that power and confine him to what the Constitution confines him to—the power of making nominations to the Senate, and allowing the Senate to decide as to whether the office shall or shall not be filled.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Oregon how the Government is to get along in case the Senate refuses to confirm any of the President's nominations. I ask whether he intends, whether the purport of his bill is, that the Government shall stop, cease to be, because of the want of concurrence between the two coördinate powers who have these appointments?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope the honorable Senator does not indulge in the supposition that the Senate of the United States will be more likely to act in a manner to overturn the Government than the President of the United States. There is nothing of that kind to be apprehended. Are the Senate to act upon the assumption that they themselves will arbitrarily and without reason reject nominations made by the President so as to prevent the administration of the Government? Are we not responsible to the people of the United States? Are we not as competent to decide upon the qualifications of a candidate for office as the President? Are we not as competent to determine whether a certain course will promote or prevent the administration of the Government as the President? Are we to surrender our power as the Senate of the United States and put it all in the hands of the President, upon the apprehension that we are incompetent to discharge our duty as Senators upon nominations made by the President? I expect that when the President makes a nomination the Senate will take a reasonable course in reference to that nomination. If the nominee be an unworthy or an incompetent man he will be rejected, and it will be the duty of the President to make another nomination in the place of the one rejected; and this bill is intended to devolve upon him that duty; and if he makes another nomination it is not at all probable that in many cases there will be a disagreement between the President and the Senate; but if it should so happen that in some few cases they should disagree and the duties of the office should devolve upon a deputy, or if the office should possibly be vacant for a short length of time, I say it is much better for the whole country than that this absolute and unlimited power over all the officers of this Government should be in the hands of any one man.

Mr. COWAN. I suppose, sir, the presumption is not any more violent against the President than it is against the Senate. I suppose that the responsibility of the Senate to the people is not indeed so direct as that of the President. And I suppose further, that if my honorable friend from Oregon has read very closely the history of the past he has found that the danger is far greater from a body irresponsible, because of its numbers, than it is from a single man. But it unfortunately happens for his theory here in this case that the President has the initiative. The office of the Senate is secondary; the office of the Senate is not to do good, it is to prevent mischief. It is not exactly in its nature active, but rather negative. The President appoints officers; the Senate advises and consents to those of them which are good; but it by no means follows from that that if there is a disagreement the President is to be deprived of his power of appointing officers, and it is too late in the day now to attempt to reverse the practice of seventy-five years, when the Government has gone upon an entirely different theory and one which I may say resulted from the necessity of the case. No matter how much the honorable Senator from Oregon and many other people may have lamented it, from the very necessity of the thing this rule has resulted, and it has been uniform in the Government; and the only question now is whether we shall be revolutionary and overturn it.

I think myself that this is revolution. I think myself the country is in a state of revolution. I think this passionate conflict between two departments of the General Government, neither one willing to trust the other, neither one willing to abide upon the original foundation on which the Government was laid, is revolution. If it be revolution, the bill of the honorable Senator is perfectly in keeping. If it be so, and if it be necessarily so, that one or the other of these two powers or two parties or two factions (if you please to call them so) is to have the appointment of the officers and the regulation of the offices, revolution will bring about that result; but if we are to remain where the Constitution put us the President has that right, and the honorable Senator and his friends will have to submit to it. If they do not like to submit to it, and if they think they have the power to overturn it and have their way, that is revolution; and when you do that where are you going to stop? What next are you going to do? The very moment you take that step you are obliged to take another and another and another; and what is the end of it? The end of it is that the Government will be crushed between the upper and nether millstone, and nothing else.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand this question to be simply a question whether the Constitution of the United States shall or shall not be observed. I understand that the Constitution makes two things requisite to an appointment—a nomination by the President and the consent of the Senate. It would be revolutionary for this Senate to undertake to make a nomination, and it is equally revolutionary for the President to undertake to make an appointment without the consent of the Senate. The two must act together.

This subject has undergone very full consideration heretofore. The committee of detail in forming the Constitution had it before them. They reported to the Convention that ambassadors and judges should be appointed solely by the Senate, and that the other officers should be appointed solely by the Executive; but that report of the committee of detail was rejected, and after mature discussion the Constitution was made as it is, making it requisite that the two branches of the Government, the Senate and the Executive, should both concur in an appointment.

Now, what does this bill provide against? The President has the power, by making appointments in the recess and then by not sending those nominations to the Senate, to continue session after session the same person in office, actually abrogating the Constitution; actually making the approval of the Senate of no importance whatever in the appointments. Attention has been called to the books on this subject, and the advocates of this measure have been told that they have not properly examined the authorities. The other day the President commended to the Senate a long extract from Mr. Justice Story against usurpation on the part of the Legislature. Consequently he approves of the writings of that distinguished jurist. Now, I desire to read to the Senate what that authority says on this very subject:

"The power of appointment, one of the most important and delicate in a republican Government"

Mr. COWAN. What book does the honorable Senator read from?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I read from Story's Commentaries on the Constitution; not his extended Commentaries, but a work based upon them and prepared for colleges:

"The power of appointment, one of the most important and delicate in a republican Government, is next provided for. Upon its fair and honest exercise must in a great measure depend the vigor, the public virtue, and even the safety of the Government. If it shall ever be wielded by any Executive exclusively to gratify his own ambition or resentment, to satisfy his own personal favorites or to carry his own political measures, and still more if it shall ever interfere with the freedom of elections by the people, or suppress the honest expression of opinion and judgment by voters, it will become one of the most dangerous and corrupt engines to destroy private independence and public virtue which can assail the Republic. It should, therefore, be watched in every free Government with uncommon vigilance, as it may otherwise soon become as secret as it will be irresistible in its mischievous operations. If the time shall ever arrive when no citizen can obtain an appointment to office unless he submits to the sacrifices of personal independence and opinion, and to become the mere slave of those who can confer it, it is not difficult to foresee that the power of appointment will then become the fittest instrument of artful men to accomplish the worst purposes. The framers of the Constitution were aware of this danger and have sedulously interposed certain guards to check, if not wholly prevent, the abuse of the power. The advice and consent of the Senate is required to the appointment of ambassadors, public ministers, as well as other high officers."

Then the learned jurist goes on to speak of the power of removal. It was first insisted, after the Constitution was formed, that no man could be removed from an office without the consent of the Senate as well as of the Executive. It was held for some time after the adoption of the Constitution and argued by the framers that the same power which made the appointment must make the removal, and that where an office was filled by the nomination of the President and the consent of the Senate, no power short of the President and the Senate could make the removal; but having all confidence in the first President, the great Washington, they surrendered that view. Now, Mr. Justice Story goes on to say:

"If we connect this power of removal thus practically expounded with another power, which is given in the succeeding clause, to fill up vacancies in the recess of the Senate, the chief guards intended by the Constitution over the power of appointment may become utterly nugatory. A President of high ambition and feeble principles may remove all officers and make new appointments in the recess of the Senate; and if his choice should not be confirmed by the Senate he may reappoint the same persons in the recess, and thus set at defiance the salutary check of the Senate in all such cases. The clause to which we have alluded is the clause giving the power to appoint in the recess. This is a provision almost indispensable to secure a due performance of public duties by officers of the Government during the recess of the Senate, and as the appointments are but temporary, the temptation to an abuse of the power would seem to be sufficiently guarded if it might not draw in its train the dangerous consequences which we have before stated."

This is the opinion of one of the greatest jurists of this country—one commended to us as Senators by the President in his veto message vetoing the suffrage bill for the District of Columbia. I think we may safely be controlled and guided by what Mr. Justice Story says.

Mr. President, this Senate, since it commenced its session, has given the right of suffrage to all the people of this District. It has stamped upon Nebraska and Colorado in their plastic form equal suffrage. It has done the same with the Territories. Therein it has followed the sovereign will of the people of the United States. Now the next step this Senate ought to take is to bring back all appointments to where the Constitution intended they should be placed—persons holding office by the nomination of the President and the advice and consent of the Senate. I think that every Senator, seeing the abuse that exists, owes it to this body, without any regard to partisan or party feelings, by proper legislation, to put a check to this mode of appointment, which practically ignores and destroys the power of the Senate.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I have a very high respect, not only for the memory of Judge Story, but also for his teachings, and I have read the same argument which has been quoted by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, and I think I have felt its force. But the honorable Senator should have informed us at the same time that the question has been decided the other way. I admit that a very strong and very forcible argument can be made upon this side of the question; but the difficulty about it is, that it has been for seventy-five years the uniform rule of the Government of the United States to allow the President this power, and as I think from the very necessity of the thing, because it has not been answered yet: suppose the President and Senate disagree, what is to become of the office during the recess? For the first time in our history this body has been declared in permanent session. Heretofore there has been a vacancy from the 4th of March to the 1st of December, and during that time there was no Senate to consent and advised to the nominations of the President. Then you meet the alternative of either having no officers at all, the Government not administered at all in that particular, or you must allow the President this power. The power heretofore has never been deemed dangerous. The power may have been annoying, just as the power is now annoying to a dominant party, who cannot have themselves all control of the offices. But why should the President appoint bad men to office? He may not appoint a member of your party; but he is interested as much as anybody can be to appoint a member of his own party who will creditably execute and perform the duties of the office, and that has been the safety of the country always.

I have another thing to say, that whenever one or the other of the two parties of this country are afraid to trust the other, then the Government is in the throes of dissolution. The whole of its strength heretofore depended on the fact that the one party in this country was always willing to trust the other party. It is true, they said it will not administer the Government as well as we would do if we had it; it will not appoint as good officers as we would do if we had the appointment of them; but still being in the same boat, interested in the same way, there is no reason to suppose they should desire the destruction of the Government. So I say that whenever a party is unwilling to trust the other party with the appointment of the officers or the administration of any particular branch of the Government it is conclusive evidence that the Government is about in the agony of dissolution. Is not the President as much interested as anybody else to appoint good officers, to have them administer the public affairs creditably? Upon that supposition the Government can stand.

But if you proceed upon the supposition that the President is a traitor, that the President is a destructionist, that he is given over body and soul to the devil, and that all his adherents and all those who believe as he does are likewise given over, what then? Then, of course, you must end this Government in order to correct that mischief. If, however, honorable Senators and everybody else were to come back to the common sense view of this matter, rid themselves of their prejudices, rid themselves of their passions, and come to the conclusion to be patient and abide the regular normal working of our institutions, there would be no difficulty. But it is from this war of factions, roused passions, terrible prejudices, that the danger to all free Governments has come. Parties cease to be parties; parties become factions; and over the ruins of the very fabric they intend to save both have occasion to lament.

What will you gain by this crusade upon the President? What do you expect to achieve by curtailing him of his power? Do you pretend that he and the men who advocate the view he takes of things are not as honest as you are; that they have not the same stake in the country that you have? Do you not suppose that he and his friends have the same care of their reputation you have; that they desire the safety, and the success, and the glory of the country as much as you do? They may differ with you as to your means of obtaining this; but it is not possible that men may differ and differ honestly?

If the President abuses his power of appointment, how is that to be corrected? Heretofore it was corrected at the next election, and the next time you come to an election you correct it by electing a new President—a man who will not abuse his power; and why so? For the most obvious reason in the world, that it was far better to endure all the ills which you can conceive of from bad and mal-administration than that you should overturn the Constitution of the country—overturn its settled law and introduce revolution. I put it to any Senator on this floor whether, suppose you have the very worst President in the world, a man who is disposed to do all the mischief he possibly can do within the scope of his not only legal but possible power, is not that better than revolution? When you take the first step in revolution, when you have overturned the first well-established principle, how are you going to stop? Is it not the law of revolution that the first step begets the necessity for the second, and so on? Is not that its history?

I see no difficulty about this thing. I see to gentlemen of the dominant party annoyance; but I believe that if they were of my temper and my disposition they would, so far from considering it an annoyance, thank God that they were relieved from the responsibility of pointing out the proper persons to administer this Government under the appointments of the Executive, because what any man under heaven can conceive of pleasure or human enjoyment in being run upon day and night and all the time in order to have his influence for office I cannot see. If my brethren upon the other side who are not consulted as to these appointments will just reflect for one moment they will see that they are happy. Wrest them out of the hands of the Executive, if you please, deposit them in the hands of some other officer over and above your conscientious convictions of duty with regard to the Constitution and the oath you have taken, and what then? You may feel conscious of a little more power, but you will not feel conscious that the Government is better administered than it was before, and you will not feel conscious that you enjoy greater ease and comfort in the part you take in it than you do now.

Mr. President, this Government has existed for a long while—seventy-six years—and for seventy-five years it has existed under this rule. Annoyance to be sure, heart-burnings to be sure, grumblings everywhere there have been by those who had not the distribution of the "plunder" and the "spoils;" but nevertheless the Government was preserved; and upon looking back over its history I think that you will find that they all got about their share. If we preserve our tempers, and if we preserve our trust in the people, (because trust in the people, as a matter of necessity, implies trust in the opposite party, in the other half of the people to which you belong,) we shall secure the perpetuity of our institutions; but nothing else will do it. I wish to say here that I have the firmest conviction in the world that if you take a single revolutionary step now in these excited times, if you overturn any well-settled principle of this Government, any well-settled principle of its Constitution, or I may say any well-settled item in its theory, you are on the brink of a precipice, and when you go over it you will have no Union, no Republic; you will have no free Government left.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senate seems to-day to be in a mood not to do much business, and perhaps that may justify the honorable Senator in threatening us with revolution and all the dire woes unnumbered that may spring from it. In this bill Congress does not propose to do anything that is not sanctioned by the Constitution. It proposes to prevent the violation of the Constitution, that is all. And now we are threatened by those who have violated the spirit of the Constitution with woes unnumbered, with revolution, with being on the brink of a precipice! Let me say to my honorable friend from Pennsylvania that the Senate of the United States is not the place for threats like these. We have already been placed on the brink of a precipice by a different set of antagonists whom we have overthrown by war. They attempted to revolutionize this Government, but they were met and subdued by the American people. Let me say to him that whenever any other power in this Government or outside of this Government shall undertake to carry on a revolution or to carry the American people over the brink of a precipice, that power will be ground between the upper and the nether millstone.

Now, what is the question here? It is a dispute as to the power of appointment to office. The Constitution of the United States declares that the President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, nominate and appoint certain officers. The President of the United States undertakes to nominate and appoint and hold in office men who have not received the sanction of the Senate and who have been actually rejected by the Senate; and now because we seek to correct this plain and palpable abuse of the Constitution—

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator will allow me to correct him?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, if I misrepresent.

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator from Indiana expressly declared that it was not the purpose of the opponents of this bill to advocate the reappointment of one who had been rejected for a particular office to the same office.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall come to that in a moment.

Mr. COWAN. Do not charge us with what we do not assert.

Mr. SHERMAN. Still the honorable Senator talked about a violation of the Constitution, about being on the brink of a precipice, about revolution, and so on. Now, sir, what has Congress done on this whole question of appointments? Nothing. We here, Senators elected by the Legislatures of the States, have seen men who voted for the present President of the United States, who were responsible for his election, turned out of office, and persons who have been opposed to us during the whole war put in their places. Have we grumbled or whined about it all? I have not seen any evidence of that kind. We simply propose by this bill to protect men who have been legally appointed to office in the enjoyment of their offices until the concurrent powers demanded by the Constitution concur in the selection of some one else. That is all there is about it. The President, on the other hand, removes without our consent the officers of the Government who are now familiar with their duties, in utter disregard of the interests of the Government, puts in men totally inexperienced to administer your financial affairs, jeopardizing your financial interests and all the material interests of the Government. Now, because we seek to resist his appointments of men to office without the sanction of the Senate, we are threatened with a revolution and with being on the brink of a precipice, &c.

I do not think we fear these things, nor do I think the American people fear them. On the contrary, I have no doubt that our constituents are far more determined, far more bitter, far more violent in their unyielding determination to resist these unconstitutional aggressions by the executive authority than either of us can be or will be.

Now, in regard to the pending amendment—for this extraordinary speech of my friend from Pennsylvania has grown out of a simple amendment—I can feel the force of the reasoning of the Senator from Indiana, that where the Senate and the President fail to agree there ought to be some way of filling the various offices in the Government—that the mere political or personal disagreement between these two constitutional powers that must concur in making an officer ought not to leave the office vacant, because if the office was vacant perhaps the Government would suffer in various ways. It might be unrepresented at a foreign court; it might not have a collector or an assessor; it might not have officers who are indispensably necessary. I might put the case of a single officer, a vacancy in whose office would prevent the payment of any money from the Treasury of the United States. No money can be paid from the Treasury without the concurrence of two or three officers, and if there was a vacancy in the office of Treasurer of the United States it would substantially suspend the whole financial operations of the Government. It is therefore obvious that we ought to be careful to guard against the possible contingency of a vacancy in office, and I have looked at this bill to see whether such a contingency could arise, but I cannot see that it will.

By the first section of the bill, everybody now in office or who is appointed to an office for a fixed term is to hold his office until his successor shall be legally appointed and qualified. That is a principle contained in the constitutions of all the States, and usually in all the laws that we have any control over. To avoid the danger of a vacancy in an office we provide that the old officer shall continue in office until his successor is appointed. It is a provision in almost every act of incorporation. The president and directors of a railroad company continue in office until their successors are appointed, so that if the time fixed by law for the election of officers passes by without the election taking place there is a provision made for the continuance of the corporate franchise. The first section of this bill makes that very provision, that the persons now holding office shall continue to discharge the duties of the offices until their successors are appointed and qualified. The third section attempts to provide for a vacancy made by death, resignation of term of office, or other lawful cause. In such case there ought to be some mode of filling the offices. The law in almost all cases designates some one who shall fill the office of collector, for example, which the Senator from Indiana put, in case the collector himself dies or the office otherwise becomes vacant. The law designates which of the deputy collectors shall fill the offices, and so of assessors, and so of nearly all officers of the Government. It is so now in the case of the Treasurer and the Register. The law wisely provides in such cases for a vice officer to perform the duties of the office, as in the case of the President of the United States; so that there is no practical difficulty.

The only question with me is whether if we strike out this clause the President may not, in violation of the spirit of this law and in violation of the Constitution itself, continue to reappoint officers whom we have rejected or withhold from us his nominations. Take the case that we have now before us: during the last recess, according to some reports submitted and laid on our table, there were two thousand removals, and perhaps more than that number. Of those two thousand cases of new nominations I doubt whether one hundred have been reported to the Senate. Although it is our duty to pass upon all these nominations, up to this hour probably not one hundred of them have been sent to the Senate. Why are they delayed? Why were not all of those nominations sent to us on the first day of the session or within a reasonable period of time? Why is the consideration of all this multitude of nominations postponed to the closing hours of this short session when every Senator knows that his hands and his mind will be occupied? Is it the purpose of the President to withhold the nominations from the Senate and thus to defeat this plain constitutional provision, and then, after we have adjourned and gone to our homes, to reappoint again the same men? If so, it is a violation of the spirit of the Constitution, for which he or any other man who does it ought to be punished.

It is to prevent that very state of affairs that this provision is inserted, that in case the President does not send a nomination to the Senate, or in case the Senate rejects his nomination, the office shall be vacant unless the law itself provides that somebody else shall fill the office. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the law does provide for some one else to fill the office. It is so in almost all the offices that I now think of, so that no practical difficulty could grow up. The only exception to this rule that I now think of is in the case of postmasters, who are appointed for a definite period; but in regard to nearly all the officers of the Treasury Department and other branches of the Government the law itself designates who shall fill the offices in case of vacancies.

If this amendment of the Senator from Indiana prevails the result will be that the President will not send to us the nominations at all, or at least he may do so. We may fairly argue from the facts we have before us that he probably will do so, or that they will be sent at so late a period of the session that we shall not have time to consider them, and thus he will continue within himself the exercise of the appointing power in utter disregard of the Senate.

Besides that, we know that in several cases he has appointed men who have been deliberately rejected by the Senate after full and ample consideration. In the case of the postmaster at St. Louis, a person who was rejected by the Senate was reappointed by the President and now holds the office. In the case of a collector in Philadelphia, a man who receives and disburses large sums of money, his nomination was brought before us and deliberately considered, not on political but on other grounds—I may say that much at any rate—the case was before the Senate for months, was deliberately considered, and the nomination was rejected.

Mr. COWAN. I should like the honorable Senator now to state the grounds upon which Governor Johnston was rejected by the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not refer to Governor Johnston at all.

Mr. COWAN. He is the collector at Philadelphia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I spoke of a collector of internal revenue.

Mr. COWAN. That is another man entirely.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will take the case put by the Senator from Pennsylvania, where a collector of customs in probably the second most important port of the United States—for I believe Philadelphia stands next to New York in the amount of the imported goods brought there—was nominated and his nomination was rejected by the Senate. The Senator may say it was for political reasons. It is not for him nor for the President to say what reason actuated the Senate. We have no right to call in question the reasons that influence the President in making his appointments.

Mr. COWAN. I am certain that my honorable friend now has forgotten all about the circumstances of the appointment of Governor Johnston.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps I have.

Mr. COWAN. He certainly would not willfully desire to misrepresent that gentleman's case. Governor Johnston was appointed collector of internal revenue for a particular district in Pennsylvania—

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not allude to that.

Mr. COWAN. He did not reside in that district at the time, and the Committee on Finance, to whom his case was referred, asked the Senate not to advise and consent to his appointment because the law required the collector to reside in the district, and he not residing there was not qualified. He was afterward appointed collector of the port of Philadelphia—an entirely different office.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the case put by the Senator the President was at perfect liberty to appoint him to another office. Governor Johnston was appointed a collector of internal revenue; he was not confirmed; the reasons for that rejection we are not at liberty to debate here in open Senate. He was afterward appointed to another office, and nobody blames the President for that. My impression was, when the Senator first mentioned the case of Governor Johnston, that he had been nominated to us as collector of the port of Philadelphia before we adjourned last summer. It seems I was mistaken in that; if so, what I said would not apply to his case; but we know that a nomination of a person to be a collector of internal revenue in Philadelphia was submitted to us, was fully considered and rejected, and yet that person was appointed after we adjourned. There was a similar case in Cincinnati.

If we strike out this clause, on the motion of my friend from Indiana, shall we not be involved in this trouble? I see the difficulty that he desires to guard against, and I should like to do it. We might do it either by providing in all cases who shall succeed an officer in the event of his death or resignation or vacation of the office, or we might do it by allowing the President to fill that office. If I believed that the President would do it and act in concert with the Senate, that he would regard the deliberate judgment of the Senate, and in each case where we rejected one appointment would select another person and send his name in, then in case there was not before the adjournment a concurrence between the President and the Senate, after a reasonable and fair effort to produce such concurrence, I should be willing to allow the President to fill the vacancy on the adjournment of the Senate until the close of the next session; but when it appears that there is a disposition to disregard and utterly ignore the action of the Senate in the matter of appointments, I am not disposed to do it. It is true, we may bring upon the American people some difficulty by vacating offices whose continued existence is important to the revenue and the public service; but in the language of the Senator from New Jersey, it would be better that the people of the United States should submit to this temporary inconvenience than that the power of the Senate over appointments should be entirely overthrown. The concurrence of the President and the Senate is essential to the making of any officers above those regarded as inferior by the Constitution. The Constitution so emphatically declares. We cannot act upon a construction of the Constitution which places this great political power in the hands of the President alone, but must construe the Constitution and must legislate so as to give full effect to the Constitution by dividing this enormous power between the Senate of the United States and the President of the United States. I shall not therefore, under the circumstances by which we are surrounded, vote to strike out this clause, because I believe that the temporary inconvenience of having offices not filled for a time is far less than the danger from the unlimited power of the Executive over all the offices of the United States.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I suppose it would be convenient and proper early in the debate to have the views of one or more members of the committee who reported this bill. I observe that the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] chairman of the Senate branch of the Committee on Retrenchment, is not present this morning, and our colleague, the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] is. Now, sir, I would propose to the Senator from Indiana that he withdraw his amendment for the present, allowing the debate to go on upon the general questions involved in the bill without being embarrassed by the particular considerations connected with his amendment. Certainly he can renew it afterward. For my own part I shall be very glad to hear either the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Vermont upon this general subject. I have reflected upon it sufficiently to become interested in it; I have formed some convictions upon particular points, while upon others my mind is still open to conviction under the influence of debate. I propose, then, to my friend from Indiana that he allow the debate to take place on the general questions involved in the bill without being confined to the particular proposition offered by himself.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is entirely agreeable to me. I simply, before there is a vote on the bill, desire a vote on this proposition, and with the assent of the Senate will withdraw the amendment for the present that the debate may take place upon the bill generally. Perhaps that debate will touch the questions involved in this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment, and it can be withdrawn only by the unanimous consent of the Senate. Is there any objection? No objection being made, the amendment is withdrawn, and the question now is: Will the Senate concur in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the pending amendment in the fourth line of the third section by striking out the words "expiration of term of office or other lawful cause." The Senate will notice that the first section in effect continues all persons in office until the successor shall be appointed and qualified. So that if we do not insert any language to control that, there will be no vacancies occurring in the recess of the Senate. The only effect of keeping these words in is to create vacancies. Without them you will have no offices expiring during the recess.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I now move to amend the same section in the ninth line by inserting after the word "Senate" the words:

Or if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to any office the term of which shall expire during any session of the Senate before the expiration of that session.

So that the clause will read:

And if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to such office so vacant or temporarily filled as aforesaid, during such next session of the Senate or if no appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall be made to any office the term of which shall expire during any session of the Senate before the expiration of that session, such office shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto, &c.

I will say in explanation what my purpose is. It has sometimes happened that offices the terms of which have expired during a session of the Senate, have not been filled during that session, but have been treated after the adjournment of the session as vacancies happening during the recess, and have been filled by commission; and the purpose of this amendment is to require these offices to be filled before the adjournment of the session, or to place them under the provisions of the section with reference—

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. COWAN. Suppose they are not filled; that has always been the trouble heretofore. There is only one of two courses to pursue: either a perpetual session of the Senate, or to run the hazard of having the office vacant until the Senate meets.

Mr. HOWE. That does not apply in reference to this case, whatever might be the inconvenience happening from the other class of cases. If the President does not fill this office during the session of the Senate, undoubtedly the old incumbent will continue to hold.

Mr. COWAN. The trouble is, the old incumbent may be utterly unfit to hold. Everybody may desire that he should be removed. He may be a defaulter; he may have committed frauds in the execution of his office; and then the question arises whether there is any power in the Government to fill that office, or shall the office go unfilled and the public suffer? I think this is an attempt to cure a mischief which from the nature of things is not curable. See what Story says about it; and here is the foundation upon which we have always heretofore acted. I am not prepared to say that it is not free from difficulty, not free from mischief. There is no part of the administration of the Government that is free entirely from mischief, or can be. But the question is whether this can be removed without creating a greater one. These difficulties exist everywhere. Nobody in the world will join gentlemen more heartily than I will if any way can be devised by which the offices are not to be converted into political spoils and plunder. If that can be done, I will join with anybody heartily in it; but here is what Story says with regard to the propriety of this grant of power to the President:

"The propriety of this grant is so obvious that it can require no elucidation. There was but one of two courses to be adopted—either that the Senate should be perpetually in session in order to provide for the appointment of officers, or that the President should be authorized to make temporary appointments during the recess, which should expire when the Senate should have had an opportunity to act upon the subject."

That was the best thing that could be devised. A very fine point arose as to what recess the vacancy should happen in. If there is any reason why the President should have the right during the recess to appoint for a vacancy happening in that recess, is not the same reason equally potent why he should have the right to appoint to a vacancy happening in the next recess? I perfectly agree that if the Senate once decide upon the appointment of an officer, the President makes an appointment to the Senate and he is rejected, if he be afterward reappointed to that same office, it is against the spirit of the Constitution; but certainly the contrary for the last thirty-five years has been always held. Ever since the time of General Jackson it has been admitted that a man rejected by the Senate for the same office might be reappointed afterward and it was good; but that you can prevent the President from filling the vacancies occurring in any recess or at any time when the Senate is not in session is simply to say that you can abolish the office altogether, which I think ought not to be, and I think it is clearly contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, and as certainly clearly opposed to the practice of the Government for seventy-five years.

I have only to reply to what is said by the honorable Senator from Ohio when he declares that I threatened revolution, that I threatened no such thing. I deprecate revolution. I protest against revolution. I stated distinctly that in these excited and troubled times, when the passions of men were heated to the highest point and when factious prejudices and hatreds were in existence so rife, this was not the time to experiment in this way, and that it would be a great deal better for us to put up with the ills which we now know of than to adventure ourselves upon others as yet unknown. I would rather, for my own part, if I were a member of the dominant party here, wait for two years for a chance to have the control of the offices, if I wanted to control them, than that I would disturb any well-settled principle of the Government now. I am not only not in favor of revolution, Mr. President, but I am of the opinion that anything is better than revolution and better than war—anything at all. I would submit to any kind of misgovernment, any kind of maladministration, and trust to time and the good sense of the people in time, when they have suffered from the calamities of such misgovernment and maladministration, to correct it peacefully, as it was intended our difficulties should be corrected, through the medium of amendments to our Constitution and alterations in our laws. But in these times, when it is impossible to deny that the minds of men are in a state of great agitation, I think this is not the proper period to adventure ourselves upon an experiment of this kind. I think we had better stand upon the decisions until there is greater quiet.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I wish to say to my friend from Pennsylvania that I sympathize most heartily with him in his hostility to revolution, but I want to assure him that I do not share at all in his apprehension of revolution. I want to point him to the valid and reliable security we have against revolution growing out of these measures, and it is in the acknowledged constitutional fact that legislation is a very different thing from revolution. We are legislating, and legislation is not revolution, and cannot be.

I want to add to that this simple remark, that legislation, under our form of government, can be no possible excuse for revolution, either made or threatened, for all legislation consists in the passing of acts by a deliberative body, and those acts are of two general kinds, either valid or invalid, and there can be no excuse for resorting to revolution against an invalid act because it has no force; and there is no justification or excuse for resorting to revolution against a valid act, because that we have a right to enact. Then, again, of valid acts there are two classes: one is good and the other is bad. You certainly ought not to resort to revolution against a good one; and in reference to a bad one I submit to the consideration of my friend from Pennsylvania that we have precisely the remedy that we have against the appointment of a bad officer. You had better submit to it until it is repealed than resort to revolution.

So, then, we shall not have any revolution growing out of this little enactment of ours, nor out of any other, if it is all the same to my friend from Pennsylvania. But in reference to this amendment, I think, if I understand his argument, it is entirely unobjectionable to him. At all events, it does no more than to put this class of offices under precisely the same regulation that those are where vacancies happen by death or resignation during the recess. This is the case of officers where the terms expire during the session of the Senate. The Constitution gives to the President no sort of power to let them lie over and treat them as vacancies happening in the recess; and this is only a provision to the effect that if such a vacancy is not filled, as the Constitution contemplates, by an appointment with the advice and consent of the Senate, the incumbent holds over; that is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, sudden illness in the family of the honorable chairman of the committee reporting this bill has called him away, and its charge has unexpectedly devolved upon me. I suppose it is proper that I should submit some views in favor of the passage of the bill; and perhaps this is as suitable a time as any other, as I find that members are disposed to discuss the merits of the whole question involved.

Mr. President, I think that Congress has the constitutional power to pass this bill. No argument need be made as to its necessity, for that is obvious and generally admitted. Whenever doubts arise as to the meaning and effect of any provision of the Constitution, as they are supposed to arise in this case, it is customary to refer to the proceedings of the Convention by which the Constitution was formed to resolve or remove those doubts. Following that custom upon this occasion, I find that in the proceedings and discussions of that Convention there was no allusion whatever made to the subject of removals from office, and therefore all the light that we can obtain from that source upon the question must be altogether a matter of inference. Some effort has been made to construe those proceedings into evidence that they sustain the claim of executive power as to removals from office, and which has heretofore been exercised; but I claim that a fair and reasonable construction of those proceedings, so far as they have any bearing upon the subject, tend in a contrary direction. I argue, in the first place, that the absence of any express provision in the Constitution conferring any such power upon the President of the United States is presumptive evidence that the men who made the Constitution did not intend that he should possess and exercise that power.

Now, sir, the absolute power to remove from office in this country is a very great power, a power that enables the Executive to absolutely control, if not revolutionize, the administration of the Government. If the men who made the Constitution intended the President should possess it they would no doubt have said so, for to confer that power in express language was an easy thing; and the fact that they did not make any provision creating or delegating such a power is, I say, strong evidence that they did not intend that any such power should exist in the President.

All primary or principal powers delegated to any department of the Government, as a general rule, are expressly described in the Constitution, and only those powers which are incidental are left to be deduced and exercised by inference or construction. Is it reasonable to suppose that the men who founded this Government and made the Constitution intended to confer this kingly prerogative upon the President of the United States—a prerogative that makes him in many respects equal to the Sultan of Turkey—without any direct or indirect allusion to the subject in the text of the Constitution? More room would be left to prove the existence of this power, by implication or construction, if the Constitution did not, when it created the executive department of the Government, describe and define the powers which that department should exercise.

Manifestly the subject was before the mind of the Convention; the question was presented and discussed there as to what powers the Executive of the United States should possess and exercise; and therefore it cannot be claimed that this omission to give the power of removal to the President was an accidental omission in the formation of the Constitution; but, on the contrary, it is to be presumed that after due consideration all provisions for such a power were excluded from the Constitution because those who made it did not intend that it should exist. Those powers which the President of the United States may exercise are specifically enumerated and defined in the Constitution; and I think it is a rule of construction recognized by all legal authorities that where general language is employed to create an office, and afterward in the same connection the powers which shall attach to that office are specifically enumerated, the particular words control those of a general nature, and the office has those powers which are contained in the specific enumeration and no others. There can be no other object in expressly declaring what shall be the powers or attributes of an office except to limit its jurisdiction and prevent the exercise of non-enumerated powers. I can see no reason why the framers of the Constitution did not grant to the Executive all the primary powers which they intended he should have, and I conclude that they did so, and they did not give him the right to remove from office, which is a power equal in magnitude to any that were conferred upon the Executive.

I fortify this conclusion by the fact that the proceedings of that Convention show that the men who made the Constitution were distrustful of executive power. Impressed with the lessons of history, they were of the opinion (and subsequent events have verified the correctness of that opinion) that it would be the tendency of power to concentrate in the hands of the Executive; and various propositions were made in the Convention to place a limitation upon his power. Suggestions were made that a council of state should be organized; that a privy or ancillary council should be formed; that persons should be placed around the President to advise with him as to his executive action. Those suggestions, however, were not adopted; but the Senate of the United States was, to some extent, placed in the relation of a council of state to the Executive.

No opinion, as I am advised, prior to the adoption of the Constitution was expressed on this subject by any member of the Convention, or any other distinguished man in the United States, except the one that is found in the 77th number of the Federalist, and ascribed to Alexander Hamilton. When the Convention submitted the Constitution to the different States of the Union objections were made to it such as had been presented to the Convention, that there was reasonable ground to apprehend that too much power was vested in the Executive; and to silence those objections, and to satisfy the country that such an apprehension was not well founded, Alexander Hamilton, who was then recognized as one of the ablest men of the day and one of those best qualified to expound the Constitution, published to the country his view of that subject; and I will trouble the Senate to hear what he said at that time as to the question before the Senate. Mr. Hamilton said:

"It has been mentioned as one of the advantages to be expected from the coöperation of the Senate in the business of appointments that it would contribute to the stability of the Administration. The consent of that body would be necessary to displace as well as to appoint. A change of the Chief Magistrate, therefore, would not occasion so violent or so general a revolution in the officers of the Government as might be expected if he were the sole disposer of offices. Where a man in any station had given satisfactory evidence of his fitness for it, a new President would be restrained from attempting a change in favor of a person more agreeable to him by the apprehension that the discountenance of the Senate might frustrate the attempt and bring some degree of discredit upon himself. Those who can best estimate the value of a steady Administration will be most disposed to prize a provision which connects the official existence of public men with the approbation or disapprobation of that body; which, from the greater permanency of its own composition, will in all probability be less subject to inconstancy than any other member of the Government."

Now, sir, to answer the objections that were made to the Constitution of the United States at the time it was submitted by the Convention, Alexander Hamilton published these views, and, so far as I am able to learn from history, they were acquiesced in by every member of the constitutional Convention; and, with the understanding that these views of Alexander Hamilton were a correct interpretation of the Constitution, it was ratified by the requisite number of States; and I say that it is fair to infer from the history of that day that the people who adopted the Constitution adopted it with the understanding that, as Hamilton says, it was as necessary that the consent of the Senate should be obtained to displace as it was to appoint an officer. Taking, then, all the authorities (and they are very meager) upon the subject prior to the discussion in the Congress of 1789, I say that the proceedings of the Convention and the statements of those who were members of the Convention tend to show that it was not the intention of the men who made the Constitution to confer upon the Executive of the United States the absolute and unqualified power of removal from office.

Coming down, then, to the Congress of 1789, we find that a discussion there took place which is relied upon by those who contend for the existence of this Executive power as settling the question in favor of their position. Whenever allusion is made to this discussion there is an effort made to surround it with some extraordinary sanctity, and we are admonished sometimes to pull off our shoes as we tread upon this ground because it is holy ground. Sir, I hope I have a suitable reverence for old men and old things; but I do not think that old decisions, like wine, grow better by age. On the contrary, they are very apt to partake of the obsolete customs and manners and opinions which obtained in the day in which they were made. I say as to that decision, in the first place, that it is not applicable to the question now before the Senate. During that Congress a bill was introduced to create a department of foreign affairs, and the bill proposed to confer upon the President the power to remove the head of that department at his pleasure, and a motion was made to strike that provision from the bill, and upon that question the discussion arose; so that the precise question before that Congress was as to whether by legislation the power ought or ought not to be conferred upon the President to remove a certain officer. The question before that Congress was not as to whether the Constitution of the United States did or did not confer any such power upon the President. I think every Senator will admit that it does not follow, because Congress can pass a law creating an office and in that law confer upon the President the power to remove the person appointed to fill the office, that therefore the Constitution confers upon the President any such power; for there is a vast difference between the powers which may be conferred upon the President by the legislation of Congress and the powers that are conferred upon the President by the terms of the Constitution. I acknowledge that the discussions upon that motion indicate that a majority of the members of Congress were of the opinion that this power did belong to the President; but it is to be remembered, in considering the weight of that decision, that there was a very large minority, including some of the most eminent statesmen of that day, who did not concur in that view. The opinion of the Senate upon the subject was equally divided, and the question was then decided by the casting vote of the presiding officer. Although, numerically, there were more votes in favor of the right of the Executive to remove under the Constitution, it is not altogether certain that the argument and the logic and the reasons were not on the side of the minority.

To sanction this doctrine of Executive power reference is always made to Mr. Madison, and it is supposed to be hallowed because it is associated with his name. I do not, of course, presume to say anything in disparagement of that great and good man; but I will take the liberty to say that Mr. Madison was not infallible, that he might have been mistaken in his opinion; that he might have been influenced by considerations which cannot and ought not to influence Congress at this time, in confirmation of which it has been said by distinguished men in discussing this subject that the probability was that the judgment of Mr. Madison was very much influenced by his confidence and respect for the then President of the United States, who was justly denominated "the Father of his Country." But, sir, in respect to this subject, Mr. Madison might have been mistaken as he was in other opinions which he then expressed, according to the judgment of modern times, and particularly in his views as to the doctrine of State rights, which has been repudiated and condemned by the judgment of the present day.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him what doctrine of State rights as advocated by Mr. Madison has been condemned?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Take his doctrine as enunciated in the resolutions of 1798.

Mr. JOHNSON. If my friend will permit me to interrupt him again, is he not aware that Mr. Madison, in more than one letter, written in 1832, when nullification was then maintained throughout the South, and particularly in South Carolina, said he had been entirely misunderstood; that so far from the resolutions of 1798 justifying secession, they denied it; and his letters are written with great ability. From the character of the man, however unfortunate he may have been in the language of the resolutions he had to explain, there can be no doubt his explanation was a very sincere one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no doubt that during this discussion I shall be greatly indebted to the venerable Senator from Maryland for information in respect to the matters involved. I know that when Mr. Madison saw what would be the legitimate effect of the doctrines contained in the resolutions of 1798 he did in letters repudiate the construction very generally put upon them, but the language employed in those resolutions is susceptible at any rate of the construction which has been put upon them by those who have contended for the extreme doctrine of States rights. I do not propose to discuss that question, as it is foreign to the one before the Senate; but I say that those resolutions, put any construction upon them you please, were the nest-egg of nullification and secession in the United States, and they have been repudiated and condemned by the American people notwithstanding their respect for the author. Mr. Madison, on the subject of the National Bank claimed, if I am not mistaken, that it was unconstitutional, but still upon grounds of expediency he thought proper to approve the act creating the bank. I refer to these things simply to show that it does not necessarily follow because Mr. Madison advocated this claim of power on the part of the Executive that therefore it exists. And, sir, if it be necessary to offset the name of Madison with another, I will put into the opposite scale the name of Alexander Hamilton, who entirely differed with Mr. Madison in the construction of the Constitution relative to this subject; and nobody will deny that if Hamilton was not the noblest he was the ablest Roman of them all.

Since the decision in 1789, which is relied upon as the great authority for those advocating the unlimited power of removal in the Executive, different men have expressed different opinions upon this subject; distinguished statesmen have differed as to the correct construction of the Constitution in respect to this power of removal. Some, such as Webster and Clay and Calhoun, have followed the opinion of Mr. Hamilton, have concurred in the doctrine that the Constitution did not contain any such authority as the President claims to exercise; while others, such as Wright, Woodbury, and Buchanan, have followed the opinion that was expressed by Mr. Madison. Some opinions have been expressed by the Attorneys General in favor of the exercise of this power; but, sir, when it is found that any Attorney General in a conflict of jurisdiction between the President and Congress has decided against the claim of the President by whom he is appointed, then I shall begin to think that their opinions upon this question are entitled to considerable attention. To illustrate my view of the weight of those opinions I will refer to what tradition says occurred when Andrew Jackson proposed to remove the deposits. Consulting with his Attorney General, he found that some doubts were entertained by that officer as to the existence of any law authorizing the Executive to do that act, whereupon Old Hickory said to him, "Sir, you must find a law authorizing the act or I will appoint an Attorney General who will." Attorneys General act generally in the capacity of advocates and not in the position of judges, and their opinions upon legal questions are entitled to as much weight as the opinions of other respectable lawyers, and no more. Looking at the authorities on this subject since the discussion in the Congress of 1789, we find prominent men arrayed on each side of the question, and it is perhaps difficult to decide on which side of the question the authorities preponderate.

Those who advocate the executive power of removal rely altogether upon the legislative construction of the Constitution, sustained by the practice and opinions of individual men. I need not argue that the legislative construction of the Constitution has no binding force. It is to be treated with proper respect; but few constructions have been put upon the Constitution by Congress at one time that have not been modified or overruled at other or subsequent times; so that so far as the legislative construction of the Constitution upon this question is concerned, it is entitled to very little consideration. Congress passes an act at one session which involves a constitutional question, and of course the passage of the act is a construction of the Constitution by that Congress; but at a subsequent time that act is repealed, or another act relating to the same subject is passed involving a different construction of the Constitution; and so you may find, in tracing the legislative history of this country, that the construction put upon the Constitution by the legislative department of the Government has been exceedingly conflicting upon nearly all of the prominent questions upon which public opinion has been divided.

Putting aside, then, the opinions of individual men on both sides of this question, which are perhaps equal; putting aside the legislative construction of the Constitution for the present, let us inquire what, if any, has been the judicial exposition of the Constitution so far as this question is concerned. I do not pretend to say that the Supreme Court of the United States has made any decision exactly in point; but I undertake to say that their decisions have a direct bearing upon the question, and so far as they do go they tend to sustain the constitutionality and correctness of this bill. I will refer in the first place to the case of ex parte

Hennen, 13 Peters, where the Supreme Court of the United States maintain the doctrine that—

"In the absence of all constitutional provisions, or statutory regulations, it would seem to be a sound and necessary rule to consider the power of removal as incident to the power of appointment. This power of removal from office was a subject much disputed, and upon which a great diversity of opinion was entertained in the early history of this Government."

I refer to this decision simply to show that the Supreme Court of the United States laid down the doctrine, in express terms, that where there was no constitutional provision or statutory regulation to the contrary, the power of removal was incident to the power of appointment. Notwithstanding it was alleged the other day by the honorable Senator from Maryland that until within a recent time there has been no controversy as to this power in the President, I do not see how the existence of this power can be reconciled with the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Marbury vs. Madison. I suppose that honorable Senators who oppose this bill will undertake to show that the exercise of absolute power over the offices of this country by the President is consistent with the decision of the court in this celebrated case. During the administration of Mr. Adams there were five justices of the peace appointed for the District of Columbia. Their nominations were consented to by the Senate; but before the commissions were issued Mr. Madison became President and refused to issue commissions to these five justices of the peace, and application was made to the Supreme Court of the United States for a mandamus upon Mr. Madison to compel him to deliver to these justices their commissions. I wish to call the attention of the Senate, in the first place, to the law under which these appointments were made, for it substantially conforms to all laws that create offices and fix a term of office in the act of their creation. After dividing the District into two counties, the eleventh section of this law enacts:

"That there shall be appointed in and for each of the said counties such number of discreet persons to be justices of the peace as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, think expedient, to continue in office for five years."

Persons were to be appointed, and they were to hold their offices respectively for the term of five years. Under that law Mr. Adams made those appointments. Those appointments were ratified by the Senate. Mr. Madison refused to deliver the commissions; and the court granted a mandamus upon Mr. Madison compelling him to give to these men so appointed their commissions, upon the ground that after these men had been nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, under that law they were beyond the reach of executive power and were entitled to hold those offices for the five years, and that Mr. Madison had no right to withhold their commissions.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will permit me, in the case to which he refers he will discover that Mr. Jefferson had made out and signed the commission of Marbury, but that the commission had never been formally delivered, but was retained.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Adams, not Mr. Jefferson.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe it was Mr. Adams.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Adams signed the commission just as he was going out of office.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, and Mr. Madison refused to deliver it. I think it was made out and left on the President's table, but never formally delivered. The question was, in the first place, as to the power of the court to compel by mandamus the delivery of the commission to Marbury, and that was really the whole question before the court.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not differ with the view of the case as suggested by the Senator, and nothing that I have said is in conflict with that suggestion. I may be in error as to the person by whom the commission was signed.

Mr. HOWARD. It was signed by the first Adams—John Adams.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; it was signed by Mr. Adams; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the opinion of the court delivered in that case, which relates to this subject. Chief Justice Marshall says:

"It is, therefore, decidedly the opinion of the court that when a commission has been signed by the President the appointment is made; and that the commission is complete when the seal of the United States has been affixed to it by the Secretary of State.

"Where an officer is removable at the will of the Executive the circumstance which completes his appointment is of no concern, because the act is at any time revocable; and the commission may be arrested if still in the office. But when the officer is not removable at the will of the Executive the appointment is not revocable and cannot be annulled. It has conferred legal rights which cannot be resumed."

Now, I say that the Supreme Court of the United States in deciding this case affirm the doctrine that under a law which fixes the tenure of office the President of the United States has no power of removal; and the decision proceeds upon the assumption that where the officer is not removable at the will of the Executive the appointment is not revocable and cannot be annulled; and the Supreme Court make a plain distinction between a law which authorizes the President to remove the officer at his pleasure and a law which declares that a person appointed to an office shall hold that office for a term of years; and this decision is to the effect that in the one case the President may exercise this power of removal, while in the other case he cannot exercise any such power. The court further say:

"The discretion of the Executive is to be exercised until the appointment has been made. But having once made the appointment, his power over the office is terminated in all cases where by law the officer is not removable by him."

Please to notice particularly this language.

"But having once made the appointment, his power over the office is terminated in all cases where by law the officer is not removable by him. The right to the office is then in the person appointed, and he has the absolute, unconditional power of accepting or rejecting it.

"Mr. Marbury, then, since his commission was signed by the President and sealed by the Secretary of State, was appointed; and as the law creating the office gave the officer a right to hold for five years, independent of the Executive, the appointment was not revocable, but vested in the officer equal rights, which are protected by the laws of his country."

Mr. BUCKALEW. If the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion to him, I do not understand that the particular line of argument upon which he is now entering, and which was followed by a gentleman from Pennsylvania in the House of Representatives at the present session, relates at all, or has any application to the class of officers referred to by this bill, who are officers appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The field of argument to which we are invited by the Senator's last remarks is one relating to the appointment of subordinate officers, the appointment of which, under a particular clause of the Constitution, may be lodged in the President alone, with the courts of law, or with the heads of Departments. Now, the powers which may be exercised by Congress in the establishment and regulation of those offices is one thing; the power of Congress over offices, the incumbents of which are appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate is another thing; and it is over the latter field of inquiry that this bill invites us to travel. I call the Senator's attention to this wide distinction at the present time, because I intend to speak throughout my remarks upon this bill with distinct reference to this broad and marked distinction between what have been sometimes called constitutional offices and offices which are legislative purely, both in their creation and in the regulation and arrangement of the duties of the incumbents of the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose that the Senator intends by his remarks to suggest that this authority is not applicable to the question before the Senate, but I claim that it is applicable because these identical persons were appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and therefore this decision relates to the same class of officers contemplated by this bill, and for that reason this is an authority in point. I cannot see why Mr. Madison, notwithstanding the views that he expressed at an early day, did not assume in this case that he had no power to remove these officers after they had been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. His manifest object was to keep these men from having their offices, and he undertook to effectuate that object by withholding their commissions; but if the doctrine that is now practiced upon had then been recognized, instead of doing that he would at once have removed those officers and appointed others in their places, for that is the rule at the present day. Men are nominated to the Senate; the Senate advises and consents to their nomination, and the President, if he sees proper, instead of withholding the commission, at once removes them and appoints other persons in their places. If Mr. Madison had recognized any such authority in the President, he would have pursued that course instead of attempting to defeat these appointees by withholding their commissions.

Now, sir, I refer to another case in 17 Howard's Reports, the case of the United States vs. Guthrie, where this question was elaborately argued, but not decided, by the court, but in the opinion of Mr. Justice McLean he refers to this subject and the authorities upon the point; and I invite the attention of the honorable Senator from Maryland to what Mr. Justice McLean there said:

"It was supposed that the exercise of this power by the President"—

And he is discussing the power of removal—

"was necessary for the efficient discharge of executive duties. That to consult the Senate in making removals, the same as in making appointments, would be too tardy for the correction of abuses. By a temporary appointment the public service is now provided for in case of death, and the same provision could be made where immediate removals are necessary. The Senate when called to fill the vacancy would pass upon the demerit of the late incumbent."

"This I have never doubted was the true construction of the Constitution; and I am able to say it was the opinion of the late Supreme Court, with Marshall at its head."

This statement of Justice McLean is either false or true, and he had an ample opportunity to know whereof he affirmed; and I say that he declares that the Supreme Court of the United States, with Chief Justice Marshall at its head, was of the opinion that the President of the United States could not exercise the unlimited power of removal. Sir, you may bring on the opinions of your Attorneys General and the arguments and speeches of your politicians, and I overwhelm them all with the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, with Chief Justice Marshall at its head, a court that towered in its wisdom and purity above the partisan clamor and strife by which it was surrounded, as Teneriffe towers above the noisy and impotent waves that break around its base.

Now, sir, it is admitted by honorable Senators who contend for the existence of this power that there is no express provision for it in the Constitution. But the great argument that has been offered time and again and repeated here from day to day is, that it would be inconvenient for the President not to have and to exercise this power. Sir, can a power of this magnitude be incorporated into the Constitution upon the argument ab inconvenienti, because it is inconvenient that such a power should not exist? It is inconvenient very often that other powers which do not exist cannot be exercised by different departments of the Government. Take for instance, if you please, the election of a representative from any State, the State in which I live, where the law requires a candidate to have a majority, and suppose no man at the election receives a majority. It is inconvenient for the State not to be represented in Congress; but does it therefore follow that the Governor has a right to appoint a member of Congress? When the electoral body has decided that there shall be no election, then can it be argued on the ground of inconvenience that the Executive shall have the power of appointment? Take many other cases that have occurred, where the two branches of a legislative assembly fail to agree in the choice of a Senator; it is exceedingly inconvenient to the State to be without its whole senatorial representation in Congress; but it has been time and again decided by this body that the Executive had no power of appointment in that case.

Take the case of my honorable friend from New Jersey whose election is now pending, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN;] suppose the Legislative Assembly of that State now in session does not effect any election at all; it will be inconvenient for that State to be without one of its Senators on this floor; but the Governor of New Jersey would have no power to fill the vacancy, because the legislative body whose province it was to elect chose not to elect, and that choice is the judgment of the State constitutionally expressed that there shall be no representation in the Senate so far as that office is concerned.

It is very inconvenient, when we pass bills here by a large majority, in accordance with the wishes and interests of the people, to have the President interpose his veto; but the Constitution gives him that right; and can we, because it is inconvenient, because it is contrary as we believe to the will of the people for him to exercise his power in that way to defeat our legislation, disregard the veto of the President and treat it as a nullity?

I might multiply cases where it is inconvenient for certain powers to exist, or for certain powers not to exist; but the fact that there is some inconvenience attending the one or the other does not prove that one or the other does or does not exist. When you come to consider the argument as to the inconveniences that may result from the enactment of this law, you must remember that there are other inconveniences and abuses that exist because there is no such law which threaten to change our republican Government into a practical despotism.

Sometimes it is argued that this power belongs to the President because the Constitution declares that the executive power shall be vested in a single person who shall be called the Executive of the United States. I answer any argument that may be derived from that source by saying that the clause of the Constitution referred to was evidently intended simply to create the office and not to confer power, because it is followed by other provisions defining and describing the powers of the office, and similar phraseology is employed as to this as is employed in creating the other departments of the Government; and besides that, I find by reference to the proceedings of the Convention that this portion of the Constitution when it was reported was in these words: "that there shall be instituted an executive department to consist of a single person," which was referred to the Committee on Style, and that committee changed the phraseology, substituting the word "vested" for "instituted," and it was passed without question, showing that the Convention understood the word "vested" in that connection to be equivalent to the word "instituted," and did not understand it to convey any other or greater power than was conveyed by words necessary to create the executive department of the Government.

All executive powers are defined and described in the Constitution, and I claim, therefore, that a new and independent power cannot be drawn to the Executive by mere inference or by some imaginary reason for its existence. Whatever idea may obtain in a country where the Government is a monarchy or a despotism as to executive power, that idea cannot be adopted in this country, for the Executive here is as much under constitutional limitations as any other department of the Government, and it was so intended by the men who framed the Constitution. Beyond question they determined to restrict and control the President, for Mr. Franklin is reported to have said, notwithstanding the provisions which the Constitution contains, that the country was about to try an experiment with an Executive that would end in monarchy.

The Constitution, as it will be seen, does not confer upon the President the power of appointment. I know that in common parlance it is said that the President appoints an officer, but the Constitution does not give him that power. It provides that "he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint." The President names persons for offices. A name is transmitted to the Senate; but whether or not that person so named shall fill the office for which the President designates him is the province of the Senate to determine. I say that the Constitution of the United States, not in phraseology perhaps as explicit as might be employed, practically constitutes the Senate an electoral body, and when a name is submitted the Senators proceed to vote, and if a majority vote in favor of the appointment of a man nominated the Constitution contemplates that he is appointed; if a majority vote against his appointment he is not appointed; and so the power over the appointment is in the Senate of the United States.

Now, sir, if it is claimed that the Constitution confers upon the President the power of appointment in any of its general clauses, I will ask the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania what it means when it provides that "the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone?" Does not the Constitution clearly convey the idea that the President alone has no power to appoint unless that power is conferred by Congress? To assume that under the Constitution the President has the absolute power of appointment in all cases is to make the Constitution, so far as this clause is concerned, perfect nonsense; for if all power to appoint was conferred upon the President by the Constitution it would be absurd to confer such power in specific cases. Why should Congress be authorized to confer a power which is already in the hands of the Executive by virtue of the Constitution?

It is to be remembered, too, that the President is authorized to fill vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate. I argue that if entire power of appointment was in the hands of the President it would not be necessary to specify these particular cases in which he should exercise the power, and the inclusion of these cases is the exclusion of all others. Sir, it seems to me, when you put a reasonable construction upon the clauses referred to in the Constitution, there is no escape from the conclusion that in all other cases, except where it is otherwise specially provided, persons must be appointed to office upon the nomination of the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

To concede the power of removal to the President is to concede the absolute power of appointment. Assume that the President of the United States may, without the advice and consent of the Senate, remove a man from office, and you ex necessitate rei assume that he may make an appointment to fill the vacancy so created.

Let us illustrate this view by the course of the present Executive. During the recess of the Senate he removed good men from office upon party grounds and then appointed his own creatures to fill the vacancies so made by granting to them commissions that would expire at the end of the next session of the Senate. The nominations of some of these creatures were rejected by the Senate and thereupon the President, instead of nominating other persons, waited until the Senate adjourned, and then reappointed the persons so rejected, thus at his own will displacing good men and perpetuating his own creatures in office in spite of all efforts of the Senate to prevent it.

Sir, if the President can exercise the power in one case he can in all cases. I object, therefore, to this right of removal on the part of the President, because it necessarily involves the right of absolute and unlimited appointment, and I am confident that the Senator from Pennsylvania will not contend that the Constitution contemplates that the Executive should possess any such power.

Two ideas are made prominent in the clause which provides that the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which will expire at the end of their next session. Let it be observed that this clause does not confer upon the President the power of appointment, but he may "fill up vacancies," clearly implying that it is a temporary arrangement required by the necessity of the case, that it is only to continue until the advice and consent of the Senate can be taken; otherwise the Constitution would declare that the President might make an appointment to fill a vacancy. But, sir, another idea which is made prominent by this section is, that this power is to be exercised within a given time "to fill up vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate;" no other vacancies. Any vacancy that may happen during the recess of the Senate the President may fill; and the clear intent of that clause of the Constitution is that as to time his power shall be limited until the next session of the Senate. I say that there are two noticeable ideas in this clause as to vacancies. One is that this filling up is to be temporary; and the other that it is to be exercised within a given time; and it is in disregarding this last idea that the President pretends to find his power to fill an office at any time that is not filled by a person appointed by and with the advice of the Senate. What is the use of taking the advice of the Senate as to an officer if as soon as the advice is taken that officer can be removed by the President and another appointed in his place without consulting the Senate? Such a power in the Senate is a shadow and a mockery. I understand this clause as to vacancies of the Constitution to be intended simply to bridge over that space of time which may intervene between different sessions of the Senate; but when this designation, or appointment if you choose, is made during the recess, then when the Senate convenes the control of the President over that vacancy ceases, and it then becomes a question between the President and the Senate as to whether the vacancy shall or shall not be filled.

The Senator from Maryland suggested that this clause ought to be construed as though it read, "vacancies that happen to exist;" and that the construction contended for by those who advocate this bill was equivalent to saying "any vacancy that may happen to occur." Now, to say that a vacancy happens to occur is simply to say that it happens; but when you speak of a vacancy that happens to exist you speak of a vacancy without any reference to the time when it originated. Take the reading of the Senator, and the President has the power to fill any vacancy; but the reading for which I contend restricts his power to certain vacancies; a certain time is described. The power is to be exercised with reference to that time. Now, sir, can it be said with any propriety that when the President of the United States, for personal ends or party objects, deliberately removes a man from office, and so makes a vacancy, that the vacancy has happened? "Vacancy" here, as connected with the word "happen," implies some casualty, something unforeseen, something like the death or resignation of the incumbent. So far as the expiration of term is concerned, it happens as to the President. Whenever an office during the recess of the Senate is made vacant by any power over which the President has no control, then a vacancy happens as to him; but when he proceeds and by his own deliberate act creates a vacancy, then it does not happen, but it is made. Sir, you might as well argue that when the husbandman plants his seed and cultivates his crop that the harvest which follows "happens" to him; or you might as well argue that when the mechanic proceeds deliberately and carefully to construct a watch that upon its completion it happens to him. When the President of the United States, consulting with his political friends, concludes that the removal of a certain man from office is necessary to advance the interests of his party, and therefore proceeds to remove him and make a vacancy, how it can be said that a vacancy then happens is more than I can understand; and to say that is doing violence to the English language and to the common sense of all men who can read the Constitution.

Commissions granted during vacancies expire at the end of the next session of the Senate. One question involved in this bill is, whether or not, when the vacancy is not filled at the session after it happens, the President can afterward proceed and appoint a person to fill the office upon the assumption that the place is vacant. I have before said that when a nomination is submitted to the Senate by the President, and the Senate refuses to agree to that nomination, refuses to elect anybody to fill the office, it must then be concluded that it is the judgment of that body that the office shall not at that time be filled. Whether the Senate acts wisely or unwisely is not material to the question; whether they ought or ought not to make such a decision is of no consequence; but if they do so decide they only exercise their constitutional power, and it is to be presumed that the decision is made for good reasons and ought to stand, notwithstanding the objections of the President.

I deny that the President of the United States, by virtue of the Constitution, has any power of removal. I affirm, and it will not be denied, that the existence of that power involves the existence of the absolute power of appointment, and the Constitution is thus made to defeat itself. All the Constitution says about the action of the Senate as to appointments amounts to nothing if you find within its provisions any power in the President to make removals at his individual will or pleasure. I do not understand that this absolute power of removal has ever been contended for until within a late period. If I am not mistaken as to the history of the country, removals without cause averaged about two for each Administration for the first forty years of the Government; and General Washington, instead of removing an officer during the recess of the Senate when he was found to be unfit to discharge its duties, suspended him, as this bill provides that the President shall now suspend in such a case. He did not claim this extraordinary power of removal; it was not claimed by his successors until within a comparatively late period; and in the discussions of 1789 it was not contended by Mr. Madison that the President had the unlimited power of removal; but it was argued that if an officer was incompetent or dishonest he might be removed by the President. When there was good cause the President, it was said, might remove; but it was admitted then by the advocates of this power that if the President of the United States, for any other purpose than to subserve the public interests, displaced a good officer it would be ground for impeachment.

This is the view of the subject taken by the founders of the Republic. Some of them claimed that the President could exercise this power but only where there was cause. Now it is claimed that the President has the unlimited control of all the officers in the Government, and that he may remove any or all of them at his pleasure and without any reason or any cause. This bill only undertakes to control what has been confessed by the advocates of this power to be an abuse of the executive authority. What does it propose to do? Take it altogether and it amounts practically to this: that the President shall not remove persons from office without cause; but whenever an officer should be dismissed from the performance of his duties and another person put in his place this bill provides that it may be done. It provides for every case where the public necessities or interests demand a change, and it only prohibits the abuse of executive power. I presume that no Senator will contend that Congress cannot prohibit by law the abuse of his authority by any officer of the Government.

Acknowledge, if you please, that the President has the power of removal, then cannot Congress by legislation declare and provide that he shall not abuse that power? It was admitted by Mr. Madison, and, for forty years after the Constitution was formed, by everybody, that a removal from office for personal ends or party purposes was an abuse of executive authority, and was a violation of the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution.

Now, sir, all we propose to do is simply to prohibit and prevent the abuse of that power. I referred to the case of ex parte Hennen, where the power of removal was held to be an incident of the power of appointment. All respectable authorities sustain that position. Now, is that law or not? Will some of these honorable Senators who contend for the existence of this power in the President tell me whether that opinion of the Supreme Court, deliberately pronounced, is or is not the law of the land? I assume that it is the law, because it has been sustained by other authorities and is not denied; and if it be the law, then I say that this bill stands upon an immovable foundation, because the power of appointment is undeniably vested in the President and Senate of the United States. One cannot appoint without the other. Now, is it good logic to argue that the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment—the power to appoint is in the President and Senate, and therefore the President has the right to remove? Is it not just as good logic to argue that the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment—the President and Senate appoint, and therefore the Senate may remove? But, sir, the correct logic is, that the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment; the President and Senate appoint, therefore the President and Senate may remove. There is no constitutional prohibition, there is no statutory regulation upon this subject, to prevent the application of that doctrine; and I say that unless gentlemen can overthrow the opinion of Alexander Hamilton, the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of ex parte Hennen, they cannot escape from the conclusion that the consent of the Senate is necessary to the removal of an officer to whose appointment it was necessary to have the advice and consent of the Senate.

The Constitution provides for certain appointments, but Congress is authorized to provide for certain other appointments. All the clauses of the Constitution bearing upon this subject contemplate that much of the control of the appointing power is to be in Congress. Where the President appoints, he is to appoint with the advice and consent of the Senate; but Congress may confer the appointment of certain officers upon the President alone or upon the heads of Departments; and so the Constitution recognizes the legislative control of Congress over this question. Congress has power to create an office; Congress has power to define the tenure of that office; and I ask why Congress has not power to say that when a man is appointed to an office which it has created, and the tenure of which it has fixed, he shall not be removed before the expiration of his term? Tell me, if you can, where in the Constitution can be found any provision that deprives Congress of this right. Does not the power to create an office necessarily imply a power to declare when and how it shall be filled? Does not the power to create an office necessarily embrace the power to declare that when a man, upon the nomination of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is appointed to fill it, he shall hold that office until by and with the advice and consent of the Senate he is removed?

I hope, Mr. President, that Senators who argue this question on the other side will not fail to notice this distinction. The question is not so much as what the Constitution does or does not provide, or as to what the Constitution does or does not confer upon the President, but the question is, has the Congress of the United States the power under the Constitution to create offices and declare during what time the persons appointed to fill shall hold those offices? All that this bill proposes is simply to say, in substance, that when a man, under the Constitution, upon the nomination of the President, is appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, he shall hold until his successor is nominated by the President and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and I ask any reasonable man if that is not what the Constitution contemplates. I say it is a plain perversion of the Constitution when, under that clause which authorizes the President to fill vacancies, he undertakes to absorb all the power of the appointment and ignores and disregards the authority and will of the Senate.

I have briefly and hastily gone over the grounds on which I assume that this legislation is within the constitutional power of Congress; and surely its necessity is apparent. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW,] who will address the Senate upon this subject, is too candid to stand up here and say that there is no necessity for such legislation, because the encroachments of the executive power upon the legislative in this respect, if in no other, are alarming; and the abuse of executive patronage is tending to undermine our institutions and is producing a demoralizing and disastrous effect upon the best interests of the country. I shall not, therefore, undertake to argue the necessity of this legislation. Everybody knows what is transpiring and what has occurred since the last session of the Senate. Hundreds of officers, good and true men, have been removed without any cause, and greatly to the prejudice of the public service, simply to promote certain party ends and purposes; and others who were nominated and rejected by the Senate at its last session have been reappointed; and in this high-handed way the interests of the country have been sacrificed and the authority of the Senate contemned to subserve the purposes of an ambitious, unscrupulous Executive. And if this policy, which has been growing every year and has at last assumed its present formidable proportions, is allowed to go on unchecked, the time is not far distant when the Senate of the United States will become a cipher and the President a perfect despot, so far as the offices of the Government are concerned.

Sir, this bill is only intended to vindicate the constitutional power of the Senate. We have more light on this subject than the men who made the Constitution. Sir, they were good men and patriots, but they were born and educated under a monarchical form of government. Some of them had certain ideas about the executive power derived from their education. I do not intend to impeach their wisdom, but they lacked our experience. We have seen the operation and effect of this power; we have seen how dangerous it can become in the hands of a bold, bad man; we have seen how it can be used to debauch the public mind. When the mischief is so great and obvious it is our duty, regardless of precedents, to apply the remedy. Believing that there is nothing in the provisions of this bill which is in conflict with the Constitution, I hope that it will become a law. I trust it will not be regarded as any mere party measure, but as an honest effort to bring back the Government to the purposes and views of the men who made it.

Mr. JOHNSON obtained the floor, and on his motion the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 14, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

CALL OF STATES AND TERRITORIES.

THE SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions for reference, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider. By the amended rule joint resolutions from the Legislatures of States and Territories may be presented under this call.

CERTIFICATES OF DISCHARGE.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, introduced a joint resolution authorizing the President to issue certificates of muster and discharge, on parchment, to all honorably discharged officers of the Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BOUNTY.

Mr. HART introduced a bill providing for the payment of bounty to the representatives of soldiers killed or who died in the service whose term of enlistment was less than one year; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVILEGES OF CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. SHELLABARGER introduced a bill declaring the forfeiture of certain privileges of citizenship by acts of rebellion against the United States, and providing for the restoration of those privileges in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT POLICE.

Mr. ECKLEY submitted a concurrent resolution that the United States police at the Treasury buildings be placed upon the same footing, with the same powers, and the same compensation as the Capitol police, and be under the orders of the chief architect of the Treasury building; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

WASHINGTON HOMESTEAD COMPANY.

Mr. WELKER introduced a bill to incorporate the Washington Homestead Company; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

SALARY OF FIRST COMPTROLLER.

Mr. DELANO introduced a bill to establish the salary of the First Comptroller of the Treasury; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

SURVEYOR GENERAL'S OFFICE—MONTANA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, submitted a joint resolution and memorial of the Legislature of Montana, asking for the establishment of a surveyor general's office, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF PAY.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, also submitted a joint resolution of the Legislature of Montana Territory, asking Congress to amend the organic act so as to increase the pay of the Federal officers, as also the members of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN DAVID BEATTY.

Mr. STOKES introduced a bill for the relief of Captain David Beatty and his men, of Tennessee, independent scouts; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, introduced a bill to reestablish civil governments in the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, and to restore said States to position and the exercise of political and representative power in the Federal Union; which was read a first and second time, referred to the joint select Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON COTTON.

Mr. NIBLACK introduced a bill to repeal so much of an act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxation," and to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, as imposes a tax on unmanufactured cotton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN RANDOLPH CLAY.

Mr. NIBLACK also introduced a joint resolution authorizing the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to reopen and readjust the accounts of John Randolph Clay, late United States minister to Peru; which was read the first and second time and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

BILL PRINTED.

On motion of Mr. HILL, a bill introduced by him on Saturday was ordered to be printed.

MILITIA.

Mr. JULIAN introduced a bill to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to amend the several acts heretofore passed to provide for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CANAL SEWERAGE COMPANY.

Mr. INGERSOLL introduced a bill to incorporate the Washington and Georgetown Canal Sewerage Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

QUIETING TITLE IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. INGERSOLL also introduced a bill to provide more effectually for quieting title to property in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

FEMALE SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. NOELL introduced a bill to amend an act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time. The bill provides that no person shall be disfranchised from voting or be ineligible to office on account of sex.

Mr. NOELL. I move to refer the bill to a select committee of five.

Mr. THAYER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to make the motion under the rule.

Mr. THAYER. I object to the reference to a special committee, and I move that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The latter motion has priority; when two committees are moved the vote first is on the reference to the standing committee.

Mr. NOELL. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were refused.

The bill was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ROAD IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. McINDOE introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Wisconsin to build a military road to Lake Superior;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MINING BUREAU.

Mr. HIGBY introduced a bill to establish a Mining Bureau; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

RIGHTS OF ACTUAL SETTLERS.

Mr. DONNELLY introduced a bill to protect the rights of actual settlers upon the public lands of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES P. PECK AND REUBEN WOOD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK introduced a joint resolution for the relief of James P. Peck and Reuben Wood, of the Territory of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

TOWN OF PRESCOTT, ARIZONA.

Mr. GOODWIN introduced a bill donating two quarter sections of land to the town of Prescott; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ROADS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. GOODWIN also introduced a bill donating lands to the Arizona Central Road Company and to the Mosave and Prescott Toll Road Company for maintaining stations and digging wells on said roads; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ACCOUNTS OF REVENUE OFFICERS.

Mr. WARNER introduced a bill to regulate the settlement of the accounts of revenue officers in certain cases; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

LOST DOCUMENTS.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill to supply records of documents lost during the late rebellion; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BUNDY introduced a joint resolution continuing the franking privilege to the members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress the same as if the Fortieth Congress did not meet till the first Monday in December next; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

NAVY-YARD AT CHARLESTOWN.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to introduce for reference a bill to repeal so much of the act approved April 17, 1866, chapter forty-five, section one, as appropriates the sum of $25,000 for the purchase of the right of draining through the navy-yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts.

I have received a copy of a paper which purports to be a deed of the land occupied now by the navy-yard, which land is sold to the United States upon the express condition that the United States shall forever keep open this sluice or drain. There may have been some transfer since that time which is not known to me; but unless there be something of that kind the act which was passed last year appropriating $25,000 to extinguish that right ought to be repealed. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask if this provision was not passed by the House with full knowledge.

Mr. BANKS. Not by me.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I knew it and tried to stop it.

The bill was then read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The House then resumed the call of the States and Territories for resolutions where the call ceased on Monday, the pending question being upon the following resolution offered by Mr. KELSO, upon which the previous question was demanded:

Resolved, That for the purpose of securing the fruits of the victories gained on the part of the Republic during the late war, waged by rebels and traitors against the life of the nation, and of giving effect to the will of the people, as expressed at the polls during the late election by majorities numbering in the aggregate more than four hundred thousand votes, it is the imperative duty of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to take, without delay, such action as will accomplish the following objects:

1. The impeachment of the officer now exercising the functions pertaining to the office of the President of the United States of America, and his removal from office, upon his conviction in due form, of the crimes and high misdemeanors of which he is manifestly and notoriously guilty, and which render it unsafe longer to permit him to exercise the powers he has unlawfully assumed.

2. To provide for the faithful and efficient administration of the executive department within the limits prescribed by law.

Mr. KELSO. Is it in order to debate the resolution this morning?

The SPEAKER. The rules prohibit debate on a resolution on the same day on which it is introduced. As this is not the same day, unless the previous question shall be demanded and seconded, the resolution is open to debate.

Mr. KELSO. I then withdraw the demand for the previous question, and, retaining the right of the floor, yield to my colleague [Mr. LOAN] for ten minutes.

Mr. LOAN. A few words will suffice for all I wish to say at present on the pending resolution. Events transpiring since the assassination of the late President have shed new light upon that horrible and bloody act. At first it was supposed to have been the rash act of a reckless young man, rendered desperate by the failure of the cause to which he was devoted. But subsequent developments have shown it to have been the result of deliberate plans adopted in the interests of the rebellion. The appeal to arms on the part of the rebels had failed; the only alternative left them upon which they could hope for success was fraud and treachery.

Experience had satisfied them that such agencies could not be successfully invoked so long as the incorruptible Lincoln guided the destinies of the Republic; but next to him in the direct line of succession stood one who by birth, education, and association was a southern man—a life long pro-slavery Democrat. In a spirit of conciliation and catholic liberality he was unfortunately placed in the position he occupied by the loyal people of the Republic, because he was a Democrat and a resident of one of the States declared to be in insurrection and rebellion. The mistake was a terrible one. True to his instincts, teaching, and political principles, in entering upon his official career as Vice President of the United States, in utter violation of every principle of common decency, he exhibited in a most disgusting manner the moral degradation to which he had attained.

Powerfully influenced by all the grosser animal instincts of our nature, without moral culture or moral restraint, with a towering ambition, which is well illustrated in his frequent egotistical boasting of his rise through all the grades of office, from that of a village alderman to that of the highest in the Republic, he was peculiarly and eminently qualified to supply a necessity which the rebel cause at that time imperatively required for its ultimate success.

The Jesuitical leaders of the rebellion, realizing the signal and hopeless failure of their appeal to force for the success of their cause, were quick to understand the advantages offered them by such a person, occupying the second office in our Government. They readily comprehended the means necessary to reach and use such a subject; but one frail life stood between him and the Chief Magistracy of the Republic; and those who could devise the infernal cruelties of Andersonville and Salisbury, of Belle Isle and Libby, and of Castle Thunder, and could quietly and unmoved observe the horrors and sufferings of those hells of malignant spite and fiendish hate, would not hesitate to accomplish their purposes by another murder, though it might be of him who was the highest, the greatest, and the best in the land, and hence the assassination of Mr. Lincoln.

The crime was committed. The way was made clear for the succession; an assassin's bullet, wielded and directed by rebel hand and paid for by rebel gold, made Andrew Johnson President of the United States of America. The price that he was to pay for his promotion was treachery to the Republic and fidelity to the party of treason and rebellion.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of order, and I ask that the words first uttered by the gentleman be taken down at the Clerk's desk. My point of order is this: I understand the gentleman from Missouri to charge the President of the United States with complicity in the assassination of Abraham Lincoln. I desire to know if that be so—and I think it is the fair import of his remarks—whether such a charge is in order, made by a member upon this floor in a speech?

The words objected to by Mr. HALE were taken down at the Clerk's desk and read as follows:

"The crime was committed. The way was made clear for the succession; an assassin's bullet, wielded and directed by rebel hand and paid for by rebel gold, made Andrew Johnson President of the United States of America. The price that he was to pay for his promotion was treachery to the Republic and fidelity to the party of treason and rebellion."

Mr. HALE. The gentleman had read another sentence to the same purpose. I ask that those words also be taken down.

Mr. LOAN. I think the gentleman is in error on that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer that those words should be read now, so that the Chair may rule upon the whole of it.

Mr. LOAN. I was about to read the next paragraph when the gentleman interrupted me, and had taken up a page of manuscript for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. There were other words uttered in my hearing at the end of the paragraph which has been read by the Clerk, and it is those words that I desire to have taken down.

Mr. LOAN. I am not under any obligation to furnish the words the gentleman desires to have taken down. Let him repeat them, and when they are taken down I can say whether I had uttered them or not. You made the point of order, and you must tell what the words are to which you object.

Mr. HALE. Am I to respond to such an address as that made to me by a member of this House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has a right to state the words which he desires to have taken down. The whole House knows that where speeches are read from manuscript, as in the case of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. LOAN,] they are not taken down stenographically by the Globe reporters.

Mr. HALE. I will state that the words I refer to were to the same effect substantially as those I have had taken down. I cannot repeat the exact language, but it carried the idea directly that the now President of the United States was a party to the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, and contracted to pay, and did pay, a price for that assassination. I cannot give the words of the gentleman from Missouri. I do, however, state that the words which he used unquestionably conveyed that charge.

Mr. LOAN. I submit that if the gentleman cannot give the other words, the point of order must stop at that point at which he can give them.

The SPEAKER. The ruling of the Chair, however, will cover the whole case, so that the point will not be lost to the gentleman from

New York, [Mr. HALE,] although the words objected to by him cannot be transcribed from the reporters' short-hand notes to be read at the Clerk's desk, as the reporters, supposing it to be all a written speech, were not taking notes at the time the objection was raised.

The Constitution of the United States, article two, section four, reads as follows:

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

Another section of the Constitution provides that the articles of impeachment must be found by the House of Representatives and tried by the Senate.

On last Monday a resolution was submitted by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. KELSO,] a colleague of the gentleman now upon the floor. The Chair will read a portion of that resolution. It declares that—

It is the imperative duty of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to take without delay such action as will accomplish the following objects:

1. The impeachment of the officer now exercising the functions pertaining to the office of the President of the United States of America, and his removal from office, upon his conviction in due form of the crimes and high misdemeanors of which he is manifestly and notoriously guilty, and which render it unsafe longer to permit him to exercise the powers he has unlawfully assumed.

2. To provide for the faithful and efficient administration of the executive department within the limits prescribed by law.

This is a charge of crimes and high misdemeanors without specifying particularly what those "crimes and high misdemeanors" were. That resolution is now open to debate. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] now charges as one of the "crimes and high misdemeanors" of which the President of the United States is guilty that he was in complicity with the assassination of Mr. Lincoln, it is certainly within the rules of this House and the provisions of the Constitution. And the Chair so rules for this reason: if it is not in order, then if any member charges the President of the United States to be guilty of treason, or of any high crime or misdemeanor, he could not state what were his reasons for making the charge; or if he believed the President or Vice President to be guilty of the crime of bribery, and desired to have the matter investigated, he could not state the specific grounds of his charge.

The charge contained in the resolution from which the Chair has read is general and not specific; it is "the crimes and high misdemeanors of which he [the President] is manifestly and notoriously guilty." The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. LOAN,] in debating the resolution, saw fit to specify one of the charges against the President of the United States. That is certainly not out of order.

Mr. HALE. I fear my point has not been stated sufficiently explicitly. My point is this: that the President of the United States cannot be put on trial before this House except by solemn form of impeachment; and that under a resolution declaring simply, as does the resolution now pending, that it is the duty of this House to inaugurate such proceedings as will lead to the impeachment of the President, these charges cannot be made; that before such charges can be made here against any officer of this Government he must be put on trial in the constitutional form.

The SPEAKER. That would be a good rule, the Chair would suggest, for action in the Senate when they are trying a specific charge of any impeachment. But before the impeachment is ordered by the House, it is in order for any member of the House to state the grounds upon which he proposes to ask the action of the House. If complicity in the assassination of President Lincoln is a high crime and misdemeanor, and the Chair has no doubt it is, then it is in order for any member to make the charge here. The charge is made here in the House, upon the responsibility of the member from Missouri, [Mr. LOAN,] It is to be tried by a committee of this House, and if they report in favor of articles of impeachment, then the question is to be determined by this House; and if the House find articles of impeachment, they are to be tried by the Senate, where the specific charges presented by the House can alone be considered.

Mr. HALE. Is the resolution now before the House a resolution for the impeachment of the President of the United States?

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution declaring it to be the imperative duty of Congress so to do, which opens up the whole question, according to the rules, as they have been construed by all who have preceded the present occupant of the chair as Speakers of this House. The Chair, therefore, cannot restrain the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] in his remarks to that effect.

Mr. HALE. Very well; I will not appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would take it as a personal favor if the gentleman would take an appeal, in order that so important a question may be decided by the House and not the Chair only.

Mr. HALE. I do not take an appeal for the reason that I consider the Speaker's decision satisfactory, so far as the practice of the House is concerned, although it is different from my own idea of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer that the House of Representatives should decide a question so solemn and responsible as this is.

Mr. STEVENS. The decision of the Chair is all right.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I will appeal from the decision of the Chair in accordance with the Speaker's request, though I shall vote to sustain it.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move to lay the appeal upon the table; and upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I will withdraw the motion to lay on the table, and call for the yeas and nays on deciding the appeal.

Mr. THAYER. I renew the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—yeas 101, noes 8.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

Mr. LOAN. Mr. Speaker, at the time when the gentleman from New York interposed his objection, I had just raised a sheet of paper to read that which in my manuscript immediately follows what has been read at the Clerk's desk. In order that the connection may be clear I will repeat a few words which I have already read.

The price that he was to pay for his promotion was treachery to the Republic and fidelity to the party of treason and rebellion. Has he performed his part of this agreement as faithfully as the rebels did theirs? How answer you, Representatives of the people? Has not the nation been betrayed by its acting Chief Magistrate? And does not Andrew Johnson stand to-day the avowed and acknowledged chief and leader of all those lately in rebellion, and of those who sympathized with them?

The conspirators having thus secured the executive department of the Government, and being sure that they might implicitly rely on the judiciary for all required aid when the assistance of that department should be invoked, it only remained for them to obtain control of the legislative department to give them full and absolute control of the Government, which being done, they, profiting by past experiences, would be careful to avoid the mistake they made under the administration of Mr. Buchanan in surrendering again the control of the Government, but would use it and its agencies as the sure means to effect their purposes and accomplish its destruction. This ascendancy in the legislative department was to be acquired by the admission of Senators and Representatives from the rebel States, and by the acquisition of sympathizing friends from the loyal States, whose elections were to be secured by means of the distribution of the patronage of the Government.

For the purpose of accomplishing the first of these objects, the Executive, in the vacation that intervened between the adjournment of the Thirty-Eighth Congress and the time appointed by law for the assembling of the Thirty-Ninth, and which (the Thirty-Ninth Congress) he could have convened in extra session at any time, by the most unheard-of usurpation of power, proceeded to reorganize the revolted States upon a rebel basis and to restore them to their practical relations with the Government. By executive orders provisional governors—officers unknown to the law—were appointed over those States; conventions were called; the qualification of voters was prescribed, and the elections were conducted under military surveillance; in a word, the will of Andrew Johnson was imprinted upon every political action there, and the result was the selection for Senators and Representatives for those States, with scarcely an exception, of the most capable, active, energetic agents of the rebellion, civil and military, that the confederacy contained. While engaged in these acts of usurpation and crime, and when some of the discerning minds in the country saw danger to the Republic in this monstrous abuse of executive authority, the President, to hide his criminal purposes, craftily misled the public—who are ever confiding in the high officers of the Government—by declaring to individuals who spoke to him upon the subject, and in official communications to those who were in the exercise of authority in the rebel States, that his interference for the purpose of reorganizing those States was only an experiment to ascertain the real temper and disposition of the rebels for the purpose of deciding the proper course that should be pursued toward them, and that the whole matter would have to be referred to Congress, when it met, for the action of that body, as it had exclusive jurisdiction over the entire subject. In the mean time extraordinary exertions were used to secure the organization of the rebel States prior to the time appointed by law for the assembling of Congress, which, with one or two exceptions, was accomplished. In the President's annual message to Congress all disguise was thrown off, and the Executive boldly demanded as a right the admission into Congress of Senators and Representatives from the rebel States as organized under his authority and by his direction.

The effect this insolent demand had on the two Houses of Congress, and the changes that the minds of various members have since undergone in relation thereto, are probably known to the most of us; but it is not necessary at this time further to allude to them than to say that the action of the two Houses has been such as to refuse admission to these Halls to the Senators and Representatives of all the States lately in revolt, with the single exception of those from the State of Tennessee.

In this action of the two departments of the Government the issue "whether loyalty or treason shall rule the Republic" was fairly made between the loyal majority in Congress on the one side, and the Executive, the reconstructed rebels and their sympathisers on the other; and upon this issue both parties appealed to the people. Pending this appeal the second proposition of the conspirators, that of securing additional members in the rebel interest by carrying the elections in the loyal States by means of the patronage of the Government and other Administration influences, was to be accomplished.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes of the gentleman from Missouri have expired.

Mr. LOAN. I appeal to my colleague to give me further time.

Mr. KELSO. I yield to my colleague so much time as he may need to finish his speech.

Mr. LOAN. The better to conceal their purposes it was proposed to organize a third or Johnson party, and for that object the "lock-jaw" convention was called and held in Philadelphia on the 14th of August last. But no one was deceived by its mummeries. The least informed and the simplest minded clearly understand that on these great questions there are but two parties—one for the country and the other against it. In the very nature of things it cannot be otherwise. He who created the universe created a heaven above and a hell beneath. There was no provision made for an abiding place for the third or the Johnson party; and all those who are unworthy of admission with the Union people in the courts above must be content to be collected together with that mass of discordant material down below. Apostates and renegades, rebel sympathizers and rebels, guerrillas, bushwhackers, and cut-throats, harmonize with the most wonderful unanimity on the presidential policy; and I am sure that no good reason can be given for their separation hereafter.

All the agencies that result from the blandishments of high official power and from the immense patronage of the Government, sufficient to corrupt any people less intelligent or less honest than ours, were brought to bear to bribe the people with their offices and their money to forsake their devotion to their country and its free institutions, its free ideas, and free speech. It is not necessary for me to enter into any detail of the desperate and reckless manner in which these agencies were used, as they are matters of public notoriety and are known to all. It is, however, proper to say that they met with that signal failure which was their just fate at the hands of an intelligent, virtuous, but outraged people.

In this canvass questions were raised and discussed before the people, one of which at least has a pertinent bearing upon the question now under consideration, and that is: why did not Congress, when it became evident that Mr. Johnson had betrayed the country and identified himself with the rebels, at once impeach and remove him, and confide the administration of the Government to the hands of some one who was in sympathy with the people who saved the Republic from rebel rule and dismemberment? There were those here then who fully realized the necessity for such action, and were then ready to adopt radical and efficient measures for securing the faithful administration of the Government, in obedience to the Constitution and laws. But there were others who, if not more hopeful of a change for the better, were at least more cautious, and they advised delay to await further developments, and in the mean time consult the people upon questions so momentous.

Yielding to these demands, golden moments and golden opportunities were allowed to pass unimproved. Upon these and all other questions submitted to them the people at the last elections, through the ballot-box, sent us their response in no doubtful tones; they have declared that they have no sympathy with traitors or treason. The conspirators, undismayed by the overwhelming majorities with which the people condemned "my policy," and with courage, determination, and energy that challenge admiration, are boldly perfecting their plans for another armed collision if success for them cannot be otherwise obtained. I have no time to enter into details now. Provoked at the fidelity of the people when a presidential party were recently swinging round the circle indiscreet utterances such as "Would you have Mr. Johnson President or King?" and the threat made at Newark, in Ohio, of internecine war unless the people by their suffrages sustained the presidential policy, indicate that revolutionary and forcible measures had been contemplated as means, in certain contingencies, to accomplish the ends they have in view. More recently the toasts proposed and the sentiments uttered in response thereto at the 8th of January banquet at the National Hotel in this city go to show the extent to which the plans of the conspirators had been perfected, and their jubilant exultation, the confidence with which they expected success. The carefully prepared declarations of the President on that occasion show his fixed and unalterable determination, regardless of consequences, to restore rebel domination in the Republic.

And the impetuous gentleman from New Jersey, who was also heard on that interesting occasion, and whose courage in speaking his sentiments is unquestioned, whatever may be thought of his judgment, discretion, or prudence in so doing, gives us reliable information of the means that will be finally resorted to to secure success when he says: "That if the electoral votes of the southern States and the conservatives of the North should constitute a majority at the next regular presidential election, and should the radicals dispute the right of their President to control the Government, he, for one, was for calling on the Army of the country." [Tremendous cheering.] "The issue would come and the brave would meet it. No one should close his eyes to the fact that this issue would have to be met."

The tremendous cheering with which these sentiments were received conclusively shows that they were not the heedless utterances of a reckless and impulsive young man, but the well-considered and approved purposes of those who heard and applauded them, among whom, be it remembered, was the President of the United States, who spoke no word of disapproval of the words of the speaker which committed him to such criminal purpose. Mark the words: "No one should close his eyes to the fact that this issue would have to be met." There is nothing doubtful in that language. But when must this fearful issue be met? I commend the inquiry to the careful consideration of those Republicans who are not prepared to act decisively on the question under consideration; and I tell them now, as the gentleman from New Jersey has told them in his speech, that that "issue has to be met." But when?

The brave man meets the danger that is inevitable, and by courage and prompt action takes it at disadvantage and overcomes it. Others wait and dread a danger that they cannot escape and which they dare not meet until, by their inaction and delay, it accumulates a strength and power that is resistless, and then it crushes them. Shall we wait until the conspirators have perfected their plans and success is sure to follow the blow they strike? Remember the issue has to be met. The brave soldiers of the Republic met it on more than two hundred battle-fields, and more than six hundred thousand of them fill untimely graves that the Republic might live. The people met the issue between loyalty and treason at the recent elections, and through the ballot-box they spoke their condemnation of all that belongs to treason and traitors, and clothed us, their agents, with full power and authority to remove the curse of treason from the Government and from all its offices, and they require us to act at once, and decisively and efficiently. They have made us masters of the situation and require us to act. They demand the immediate reorganization of the rebel States upon the basis of loyalty, universal liberty, and impartial suffrage, free speech and a free press and protection to person and property alike in every part of the Republic. For the sake of excluding rebel Senators and Representatives from Congress they are not content to have discord and anarchy under control of rebel influences to continue its rule in the rebel States; to have the loyal sentiment there crushed out for want of active protection from the Federal Government; the Union people murdered and their property confiscated; nor are they willing to continue the Government in its present anomalous condition, whereby nearly one third of the States that ought to compose the Union are prevented from resuming their practical relations to the Government to the great injury of the national credit and to the great danger of the Government itself. Inaction on our part may enable the rebels to secure the absolute control of the Government. Already they can rely with the most implicit confidence upon two of the three departments of the Government, and they are now preparing to take control of the third; and should success attend their efforts, which is not at all improbable so long as we fail to do our duty, it will then become an immaterial question to consider what we will do with the rebels, and the pertinent inquiry will be what will the rebels do with us? But enough of this; let us return. In the language of the gentleman from New Jersey, "the issue has to be met."

To-day we have the advantage and the power. Have we the courage to act? To strike down and forever destroy that fell spirit of treason and rebellion that has draped our land in mourning and threatened our existence as a nation?

The past is gone; the future may never come to us; the present only is ours. Our duty is clear. Let none fail in the performance of their duty.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman has upon this floor deliberately charged upon the Chief Executive of this nation complicity in assassination. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he does not feel it due, as well to his own sense of self-respect as to a proper regard for the dignity of this House and for the character of this Government both at home and abroad, that, before he takes his seat, he shall at least disclose to the House some particle of evidence on which that charge, so grave in its nature, is founded. I have waited thinking that before the gentleman took his seat he would at least intimate to this House that he had such proof. I now challenge him to specify any particle of proof which he can lay before the House or to which he can point as existing in any quarter. I insist that it is due to the dignity of this body, as well as to the character of this nation, that he shall do so before he takes his seat.

Mr. LOAN. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to pursue this matter in my own way and in my own good time. I have taken the initiatory steps in regard to this matter. It is now in course of progress. The course which this resolution will take will carry it before the proper tribunal to inquire into this matter; and there in a legitimate way the proofs, I presume, will be furnished to the gentleman's satisfaction.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman answer the other part of my question?

Mr. LOAN. I must decline.

Mr. HALE. A single question—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that he declines answering further. The morning hour has expired, and the resolution goes over till next Monday. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KELSO] has thirty-three minutes remaining of his time.

RECORDING VOTES.

Mr. LE BLOND. I rise for the purpose of submitting a motion to suspend the rules. On account of sickness in my family I was unable to be here on the reassembling of Congress after the holidays. During my absence the House adopted three propositions upon which I desire to record my vote. One is the joint resolution introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] relative to the construction of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery; another is the bill relative to suffrage in the District of Columbia; and the third the impeachment resolution of my colleague, [Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio.] I move that the rules be suspended to allow me to record my vote on all those propositions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the manuscript of the Journal has already gone to the printer, and is probably printed by this time.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then it makes no difference. I should have voted with the minority on all those questions.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the rules will be regarded as suspended and the gentleman's vote will be recorded, if the Journal is not already printed.

There was no objection.

Messrs. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, STEVENS, ROLLINS, MOORHEAD, RADFORD, and MARSHALL asked and obtained, under a suspension of the rules, leave to record their votes on the same propositions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move a suspension of the rules to allow any member during to-day to record his vote on the three propositions which have been named.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio.

TEXAS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House any report in his possession of General Wright, and also the reports of his subordinate officers, in regard to the condition of affairs in Texas.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

A. B. MOREY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be directed to communicate to this House all the papers before him in the matter of A. B. Morey, indicted in the local court at Vicksburg, Mississippi, together with his opinion thereon.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

COST OF SMALL-ARMS, ETC.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House with a list showing the number of small-arms furnished by the manufactory at Springfield, and the cost thereof; also the number of small-arms furnished by contractors, manufactured in the United States, other than those obtained at Springfield, and the cost of the same; and also the number of small-arms purchased of foreign countries, and the cost of the same.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, requires unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. JOHN W. FORNEY, its Secretary, in which he announced that that body had passed without amendment House bill No. 715, setting aside certain proceeds from internal revenue for the erection of penitentiaries in the Territories of Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota.

It further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 451) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth K. Smith, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

CURTALMENT OF CURRENCY.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, as the opinion of this House, That the public interests will not justify a greater curtailment of the national circulation than $4,000,000 per month, or $48,000,000 during the year 1867, which $48,000,000 ought not to be exclusive of and in addition to the compound-interest notes falling due during the current year.

Resolved, That in lieu of such an amount of compound-interest notes as may become due and be redeemed within the year as may be in excess of the four millions of currency now authorized by law to be withdrawn from circulation each month, the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be authorized and required to issue United States legal-tender notes without interest.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to suspend the rules. A bill was referred to the committee at the last session and no report has yet been made on this important subject. I think it is time we should have some expression by this House.

Mr. LE BLOND. I rise to a point of order. The rules have not been suspended, and debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then I object.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. When the resolution is introduced will it be in order to move its reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

The SPEAKER. It will if the rules be suspended and the previous question be not sustained.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say, Mr. Speaker, I have been anxious for a fortnight to have this subject taken up, discussed, and acted on.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, demanded the yeas and nays on suspending the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 75, nays 67, not voting 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Davis, De-frees, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Julian, Koontz, Kuykendall, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercer, Moulton, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Stevens, Stillwell, Stokes, Strouse, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Tison, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Boyer, Campbell, Cooper, Culver, Daves, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Farnsworth, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hise, Hogan, Hooper, John H. Lawrence, Le Blond, Lettwith, McRuer, Moorhead, Morrill, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Scofield, Shanklin, Spalding, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, and Wentworth—67.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Barker, Beaman, Blow, Branderage, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Darling, Delano, Dumont, Eggleston, Eldridge, Good-year, Grinnell, Harris, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Laflin, William Lawrence, McCullough, McKee, Miller, Morris, Myers, Newell, Phelps, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Whaley, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—39.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

During the vote,

Mr. LE BLOND stated that Mr. ELDRIDGE was detained at his room by illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

NATIONAL BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this House it is not expedient to increase the amount of the national bank notes for circulation beyond the amount of $300,000,000, now authorized by law.

On suspending the rules there were—ayes 65, noes 35.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 88, nays 51, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Cullom, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Denison, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Finck, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Kootz, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McRuer, Mercer, Moulton, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Scofield, Shanklin, Stokes, Taber, Thayer, Upson, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, Elibu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Bundy, Campbell, Cobb, Cooper, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Henderson, Hill, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Latham, Lettwich, Longyear, Marston, McIndoe, Morris, Nicholson, Patterson, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Stilwell, Strouse, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Henry D. Washburn, and Wentworth—51.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Barker, Beaman, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Culver, Darling, Dumont, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Grinnell, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, Jones, Kelley, Laffin, William Lawrence, McCullough, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Newell, Noell, Phelps, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Whaley, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—52.

So (two thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. ROLLINS. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the following preamble and resolution from the Committee on Public Expenditures:

Whereas Thomas H. Oakley, of the city of New York, was, on the 11th day of January, A. D. 1867, duly summoned to appear and testify before the standing Committee of this House on Public Expenditures appointed to investigate the frauds in the New York custom-house, and has appeared and refused to testify before said committee pursuant to said summons: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to take into his custody the body of said Thomas H. Oakley, wherever to be found, and to have the same forthwith brought before the bar of the House to answer for contempt of the authority of the House in thus failing and refusing to testify before said committee.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. I would inquire whether any report has been made upon which this resolution is based?

Mr. ROLLINS. I have a letter from the chairman of the committee, which I will read if desired.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would inquire whether this party has been duly served with process.

Mr. ROLLINS. He has; he came before the committee and refused to testify at all.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble and resolution were agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMPENSATION FOR SLAVES ENLISTED.

Mr. COOK. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to move that the rules be suspended for the consideration of a joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes."

The joint resolution was read. It provides that so much of section twenty-four of an act approved February 24, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1863, as provides that the Secretary of War should appoint a commission in each of the slave States then represented in Congress charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer might owe service just compensation, not exceeding $300 for each colored volunteer, be suspended until otherwise provided by law; and that the duties and compensation of the commissioners heretofore appointed under said section shall cease from the date of the passage of this resolution.

The question being upon suspending the rules in order to allow the Committee on the Judiciary to report the joint resolution,

Mr. FINCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 32, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Ketcham, Kootz, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elibu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Cooper, Darling, Dawson, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Lettwich, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, and Andrew H. Ward—39.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, James M. Ashley, Barker, Beaman, Benjamin, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Denison, Dumont, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Grinnell, Hale, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jones, Kelley, Laffin, William Lawrence, Marston, McCullough, McRuer, Miller, Myers, Newell, Phelps, Plants, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sloan, Starr, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—48.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

During the roll-call,

Mr. MORRILL said: I am requested to inform the House that my colleague, Mr. WOODBRIDGE, is detained from the House by sickness.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the joint resolution was then read a first and second time, and the question recurred upon ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. COOK demanded the previous question on the engrossment of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. COOK demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I call for the reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. FINCK. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 36, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Ketcham, Kootz, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Stokes, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elibu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Chanler, Dawson, Denison, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Johnson, Latham, Le Blond, Lettwich, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, and Andrew H. Ward—36.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Barker, Beaman, Blow, Brandegee, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Cooper, Darling, Dodge, Dumont, Eggleston, Eldridge, Garfield, Goodyear, Grinnell, Hale, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Laffin, William Lawrence, McCullough, McIndoe, Miller, Moorhead, Myers, Newell, Phelps, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—48.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL LEGAL-TENDER CURRENCY.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the rules be suspended in order to allow me to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill providing for the repeal of all laws and parts of laws giving to the Secretary of the Treasury authority to withdraw any of the national legal-tender currency from circulation, except compound-interest notes, which shall be funded in the bonds of the United States as soon as they mature.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion to suspend the rules.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays, and there were on a division—ayes fourteen, noes not counted; not one fifth voting in the affirmative.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. CULLOM called for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were ayes seventeen; not one fifth of a quorum voting in the affirmative.

Tellers were accordingly refused, and the yeas and nays were refused.

So the rules were not suspended.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title:

An act (S. No. 383) for the relief of Lewis Dyer, late surgeon of the eighty-first regiment Illinois volunteers; when the Speaker signed the same.

FIRST COLLECTION DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of January 4, 1867, a report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue relative to collections in the first district of Illinois, penalties assessed therein, &c., during the year 1866.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved that the communication, with the accompanying documents, be printed, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

WRECK OF STEAMER SCOTLAND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of January 9, 1867, a report of the Quartermaster General relative to the wreck of the steamer Scotland; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

OCCUPATION OF MATAMORAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th ultimo, requesting information regarding the occupation of Mexican territory by the troops of the United States, I transmit a report of the Secretary of State and one of the Secretary of War, and the documents by which they were accompanied.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

WASHINGTON, January 14, 1867.

Mr. BANKS moved that the message and accompanying documents be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

REVOLUTION IN CANDIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in answer to a resolution of the 17th ultimo calling for information relative to the revolution in Candia, a report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 10, 1867.

Mr. BANKS moved that the message and accompanying documents be printed and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 715) entitled "An act setting aside certain proceeds from internal revenue for the erection of penitentiaries in the Territories of Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota; whereupon the Speaker signed the same.

SUPPRESSION OF THE COOLIE TRADE.

Mr. BANKS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, which is rendered necessary by events that are transpiring every day:

Whereas the traffic in laborers transported from China to other eastern countries, known as the coolie trade, is regarded by the people of the United States as inhuman and immoral; and whereas it is abhorrent to the spirit of modern international law and policy, which have substantially extirpated the African slave trade, to permit the establishment in its place of a mode of enslaving men differing from the former in little else than the employment of fraud instead of force to make its victims captives: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the duty of this Government to give effect to the moral sentiment of the nation, through all its agencies, for the purpose of preventing the further introduction of coolies into this hemisphere or the adjacent islands.

There being no objection to the introduction of the resolution, it was considered and unanimously adopted.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting the report of the Commissioner of Immigration, in compliance with the act of Congress, approved July 4, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

COLORADO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a copy of the laws of the Territory of Colorado; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

EXTRA PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYEES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Clerk of the House in regard to extra compensation voted by various resolutions of the House at the last session; which with the accompanying documents was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the bill (S. No. 456) entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union." The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] to refer the bill to the Committee on the Territories.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas on the 21st day of March, A. D. 1864, Congress passed an act to enable the people of Nebraska to form a constitution and State government, and offered to admit said State, when so formed, into the Union upon compliance with certain conditions therein specified; and whereas it appears that the said people have adopted a constitution which, upon due examination, is found to conform to the provisions and comply with the conditions of said act, and to be republican in its form of government, and that they now ask for admission into the Union: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the constitution and State government which the people of Nebraska have formed for themselves be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and that the said State of Nebraska shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the United States of America, and is hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Nebraska shall be, and is hereby declared to be, entitled to all the rights, privileges, grants, and immunities, and to be subject to all the conditions and restrictions of an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nebraska to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved April 19, 1864.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgement or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I propose to yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether this bill has been printed.

The SPEAKER. According to the recollection of the Chair, no order has been made for the printing of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio to what extent he proposes to allow debate.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. At the expiration of my hour I shall ask the House to sustain the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman propose to confine the whole debate to an hour? I desire to offer a few remarks on this bill.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I am entitled to two hours, one after the previous question shall have been sustained.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that the usual rule does not apply in this case, as this bill is not reported from a committee. If this bill were reported back from a committee, the gentleman reporting it would be entitled to an hour after the previous question had been sustained. But in the present posture of the bill, debate, except by unanimous consent, will close when the previous question has been sustained.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. So far as I can control the matter the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] shall have all the time he wishes.

Mr. STEVENS. I trust I shall have consent to offer at this time an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer, which is now pending, precludes any motion to amend the bill.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to ask whether the bill is debatable generally under this motion to refer.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer opens up the whole question.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, this is the same bill which passed this House at the last session with an additional section now put to it. At the last session I among others voted against the bill upon the ground that it disfranchised a part of the adult male citizens of the United States residents of that Territory. If the bill was in the same shape at the present time I would vote against it again. It is because I believe the bill has been altered in that particular effectually that I propose to vote for it. I am sorry in the limited time which will be allowed me it will be impossible to enter to any extent into the argument on which conviction I have reached is founded, but I will venture at least to state my conviction and some of the reasons which have produced it.

The section to which I allude is the section which has just been read by the Clerk, and which attaches the fundamental and unalterable condition to our enactment that no adult male shall be deprived of the right of suffrage in the future State of Nebraska.

It is clear that neither the people nor the Legislature of a Territory can make a State government without an act of Congress. It is also clear—and the practice justifies the assertion—that the act of Congress need not necessarily precede the formation of the constitution by the people. It may be subsequent or it may be precedent. Where the action of Congress is precedent, in the nature of an enabling act, it does not bind Congress unless in its terms it amounts also to an act of admission. Congress may change, and in repeated instances has changed by the act of admission, the constitution formed by a convention of delegates under an enabling act. This is upon the ground that the whole action emanates from Congress, and that the sole authority to create State governments within the limits of the United States, in territory not embraced within any organized State, rests with Congress, to be exercised through a convention of delegates, through the territorial Legislature as its agents, or by its own action.

I have said Congress has on various occasions, after an enabling act, changed and altered the constitution presented here by a convention pursuant to the enabling act; and I will give one or two instances in which that has been done.

In the case of Arkansas Congress rejected a portion of the constitution formed by a convention authorized by an enabling act.

In the Iowa case Congress rejected an ordinance of the convention and proposed a substitute.

In the case of Kansas precisely the same action was had.

In the case of Louisiana, after the enabling act and when the State came up for admission, Congress annexed a condition that her navigable waters should be free to all the citizens of the United States.

Where there is no enabling act, where the people of their own motion have got together in convention, or in any other unauthorized way, and prepared a constitution and form of State government, then of course the whole vitality of the constitution arises from the subsequent action of Congress ratifying that movement of the people.

In the case of California there was no enabling act, and Congress at the time of her admission as a State, and in the act of admission, annexed these conditions: 1. That the State should never interfere with the Government of the United States in disposing of the public lands. 2. That the State should never tax the public lands. 3. That the State should not tax non-resident land owners at a higher rate than resident; and 4. That the navigable waters of the State should always remain free to citizens of the United States.

In the case of Michigan, where as in California there was no enabling act, and where the constitution and form of government proceeded from unauthorized men, Congress in the passage of the act admitting the State limited the boundaries thereof, throwing out some of those who had actually by their representatives participated in forming the constitution.

The uniform action of Congress upon the question of the admission of States justifies me in saying that the Government of the United States, by its Congress, either mediately or immediately makes the State constitution in all cases.

I maintain that nothing that is done by the people of the Territory about to become a State, even by virtue of an enabling act, binds Congress, unless the enabling act itself does; that is, unless it is itself an act of admission as well as an enabling act.

In the case in question the constitution and form of government presented by Nebraska is not the result of any enabling act. No convention of the people of Nebraska have presented that form of constitution and government here. It comes from an unauthorized body of men. Some citizens of the Territory, without any authority of law, got together and made this document, and are now presenting it here for us to enact into a law. It is true there was an enabling act, but for reasons best known to themselves the citizens of that Territory have not acted under it, or if they have they have chosen not to avail themselves of its provisions, and the territorial Legislature, without any authority of law whatever, have presented this document to Congress. It is true it was submitted to a vote of the citizens of the Territory, but there was no authority so to submit it, and the submission is of no further effect than to satisfy us that in the form in which it was presented during the last session, that is, without the last section here inserted, it was satisfactory to the people. Their action was not by reason of any law enabling them either to adopt or reject it. Hence no man was authorized to vote at that election, and the vote was only given for the purpose of affording the information as to what his wish was. He was not called upon to make any election in the premises.

If I am right here, that Congress is doing all the business in its present enactment, is really taking up that which never had any validity and proposing to give it validity, then it is not this act alone that we are now proposing to pass, but it is the entire Constitution that is proposed to be made; the proposed action of Congress is to make a constitution for Nebraska. Now, I grant that it is right and proper that a constitution formed for the people of the Territory and intended for their future State should be submitted to them for adoption. It is fair; but I ask where is the provision of the Constitution or laws of the United States requiring it? I grant that Congress should do nothing in violation of the principle that the people of a State should be allowed self-government within constitutional State powers; but Congress may do this, and what I maintain is, that we are now getting up a constitution and form of government for the future State of Nebraska, and that we may make it what we please so that we keep within our own powers under the Constitution. The people of the Territory should of course have a chance of accepting or refusing, but there is no constitutional or legal obligation upon us to submit it to them. We ought to do it, and we propose to do it.

Now, there are several modes by which a constitution may be submitted to the people intended to be bound by it, and one of these is by enacting that constitution into a law and letting the people say whether they will organize under it. If after the lapse of a month from the passage of such an act we find a State actually existing there, duly organized with executive, legislative, and judicial departments, with representatives in both Houses of Congress, then history will have determined that the people of that State have accepted the provisions of the Constitution. If they organize as a State, they do it under this act. This act then becomes a part of their organic law. In fact, this act, embracing as it does the Constitution itself, becomes their organic law, and every part of it is binding upon them. They cannot accept the law and reject the proviso.

It is urged against the proviso to the bill that it is an attempt on the part of Congress to fix the right of suffrage in a State. This is not so. It is only an attempt to fix the right of suffrage for the future State at a time when everybody will admit that no power but Congress can fix it. Who but Congress can legally say what citizens of the United States, residing in a Territory, shall vote in the organization of a State or in the State when organized? How long the proviso will bind the future State and whether the people can alter that as well as other parts of their constitution, are questions to be decided when they arise. It is no objection to it in my mind that it proposes to bind them forever.

I contend that the legal effect of the proviso is to strike the word "white" out of the constitution we are proposing to legalize. Congress is about to give the citizens of the United States residing in Nebraska a State government. It is surely competent for us to say that we give that government to all the citizens of the United States residing in the Territory, and not to a portion of them; and that is just what the proviso purports to do.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just taken his seat, has signally failed in the precedent which he has cited to sustain this kind of legislation. If I mistake not, the very citations which he makes all apply to just that kind of question over which Congress would have had the right to exercise its control, even had the provision not been inserted in the act admitting the States. For instance, the act declared that the rivers of Louisiana should be open to free navigation, and in the case of California it declared that the public domain should be wholly governed by the United States without interference by State legislation. Those are matters which, even if not mentioned at that time, would have been entirely within the power of Congress at any subsequent time. But this is a matter wholly relating, according to the uniform practice of the Government heretofore, to something internal, something which the States alone, without any external action or interference on the part of Congress, have had control and authority over since the foundation of the Government.

Now, I wish to ask the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] or any other lawyer upon this floor—and I want the chairman of the Committee on Territories to answer it—the question, whether he thinks this amendment will effect the end which he declares he desires?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope so.

Mr. BLAINE. He hopes so. Is it not a faint hope? Does the gentleman indulge very lively hopes in that direction?

Now, for myself, there is one thing I have a great prejudice against, and that is being duped and humbugged. If gentlemen wish to admit Nebraska here without any condition at all, just as States have been admitted heretofore, leaving the question of suffrage to be settled by that State in its own legislative or constitutional convention, I can understand it. That is a fair, square, and manly proposition. If, on the other hand, you mean to say that Nebraska shall be admitted on this condition only, and that you will exact her concession to it, I can understand it. But to dodge between the two positions, to say, upon the one side, that this provision effects the object, and then turn round and say to the other side that it does no harm because it is a mere placebo to certain prejudices here, I confess I think it disgraceful legislation; and I have not heard any gentleman here say that he has any confidence that this amendment will amount to anything as a legal and binding condition on the people of Nebraska.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] says that if subsequent action occurs it will be presumed that they have ratified the condition, and that action is if they send Senators and Representatives to Congress. Now, I understand that if this act goes through and the President approves it, his signature will not be dry upon it before a Representative will be sworn in here and two Senators at the other end of the Capitol. How does that become the popular assent of the people of Nebraska? How do you impose any obligation upon them by letting in three gentlemen, who are anxious to take seats here, to come in and swear their oaths and take their seats. How will that affect the question? Now, if this thing is valid, if the EDMUNDS amendment, as it is popularly termed, has any validity at all in it, why the reconstruction problem is very simple. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] will tell me that as chairman of the Committee on Territories or as a member of the House he believes in this, why not apply it to Virginia to-morrow and to South Carolina the next day? Let us apply it right through and settle the question of reconstruction at once. If it is valid in this case it must be valid in any case. But I repeat there is scarcely a gentleman here who has the slightest confidence in it or who does not confess that it is a legislative humbug; and for one, while under certain circumstances I might be willing to vote for the admission of Nebraska—and I wish she was in; she is a growing, prosperous State that ought to be in the Union—I protest for one against humbugging myself, or being humbugged, or assisting in humbugging my constituents. I protest, therefore, against the bill in its present form.

I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio, before I take my seat, a single question. Is he willing to let me offer an amendment providing that the people of Nebraska, either through their Legislature or convention, shall assent to and ratify this condition?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. No, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. That exposes the hollowness of the whole affair.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I yield now to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] for twenty minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio what course he proposes to take with this bill?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I shall ask the House to sustain the previous question at the end of two hours, and I propose to have a vote on the bill to-night.

Mr. ROGERS. There are several gentlemen upon this side of the house who are opposed to the bill, and who would like to discuss the question.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. All the speeches which have been made thus far have been in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I intend to give my support to this bill; but before doing so I desire to state my reasons. It is known to the House and to the country that at the last session we passed bills for the admission of the States of Nebraska and Colorado into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever. The constitutions upon which the people of those Territories organized their forms of State government were the same then that they are now; and I submit, therefore, to the House and to the country, that the Thirty-Ninth Congress cannot, without stultification, refuse to do this session what it did at the last session in relation to these two States and their admission. Your Journals will show that in each case the bills for the admission of the States passed this House by a vote of more than two thirds. The one perished by the veto of the President; the other perished by the act of the President and by lapse of time, the Congress having adjourned before the expiration of ten days after its passage. I propose to stand now by the record I made then, and trust the House also will stand by its own record on the premises.

I regret that the Senate have deemed it necessary to add the third section to this bill. In other respects the bill is the same that we passed at the last session. Notwithstanding the third section, I shall vote for the bill for the reasons I shall give. My first objection to the third section, imposing a condition upon the State of Nebraska, is that it is repugnant, in every sense of the word, to the first section of the bill and the preamble. The preamble of the bill recites that the people of Nebraska have adopted a constitution in conformity with the provisions and conditions of the enabling act of Congress and republican in its form of government. The first section of the bill enacts:

That the constitution and State government which the people of Nebraska have formed for themselves be, and the same is hereby accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and that the said State of Nebraska shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the United States of America, and is hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever.

The section added to the bill of the last session by the Senate provides—

That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of exercise of the elective franchise, or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

The constitution of the State, which is confirmed by the first section of this bill, limits, as do the constitutions of an overwhelming majority of the States of this Union, the exercise of the elective franchise and the privilege of the franchise of office to white citizens of the United States. That constitution with that limitation is expressly ratified and confirmed by the first section of the bill, while the same constitution is attempted to be disaffirmed by the third section of the bill; so that the two sections cannot stand together. If the third section is passed and valid in law Nebraska becomes a State, not upon the constitution made by the people, but on a constitution made by Congress; if the first section is valid, the State is admitted in violation of the third section; therefore, if this bill shall pass in the form in which it now is, the one or the other of those sections must fall.

Again, the first section declares that the—State of Nebraska shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the United States of America, and is hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever.

Now, I venture to affirm that the legislation which is attempted to be imposed upon this State by the third section of this bill has no parallel in anything that has ever before been attempted by an American Congress. It is a guaranteed right of every State in this Union to regulate for itself the elective franchise within its limits, subject to no condition whatever except that it shall not so exercise that power and so regulate the elective franchise as to transform the State government from one republican in form into any other form of government. The right of the majority of the male citizens of the United States of full age to control its political powers is of the essence of the rights guaranteed to the States by the first article, second section, of the Constitution of the United States, and reaffirmed by that other provision of the Constitution of the United States which declares "that the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

The provision of the Constitution of the United States is—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."—Article I, section 2.

Now, sir, what is a republican form of government? If there is anything settled under the American Constitution by the traditions of our people and by the express laws of this land, it is the absolute, unquestioned, unchallenged right of a majority of American male citizens, of full age, resident within an organized constitutional State of this Union, to control its entire political power, both State and national, in the mode prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. It has been so settled time and again, legislatively and judicially, and finally it was so settled upon hundreds of stricken fields of battle, through four years of war, that the majority of the people, speaking through organized State governments, had an unquestioned right to control unchallenged the exercise of the elective franchise under their respective State laws and compel obedience to the decision. That and all other political rights of the people of the several States, acting under the Constitution of the United States, were challenged by the late rebels in arms, and the American people by wager of battle reaffirmed in fire and blood, where the earthquake led the charge, that there should be no appeal in this land from the decision of the legal majority, either in the affairs of the State or in the affairs of the nation. I stand, sir, by that decision, the right of the majority to rule under the law and subject to the Constitution.

Again, sir, this principle has been affirmed since our session opened by the solemn act of twelve million people, through their representatives in the Legislative Assemblies of twelve organized States, in the solemn ratification of that constitutional amendment which this Congress proposed, and upon the final adoption of which, and its incorporation into the Constitution, depends, in my judgment, the future safety of the Republic. The last clause of this bill is in utter conflict with one of the provisions of the proposed constitutional amendment, as it is in conflict, as I have already shown, with the existing text of the Constitution. The provision of the constitutional amendment to which I refer is as follows:

"Sec. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

What is this but a reaffirmation of the principle that the power of the several States in this Union shall be equal in this: that their representative power must be according to the whole number of their representative population and not otherwise. It was so always, with the exception of that provision which was made on account and in restraint of slavery then in our midst; just as this amendment is now made in restraint of any abuse by the States of the reserved power in each to prescribe the qualifications of electors.

But, Mr. Speaker, I recur to the provisions of the third section of this bill, and ask, if that is to be held valid and become law, what becomes in that event of the second section of the first article of the Constitution, before recited, that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Why, sir, Congress might as well determine by law of Congress who shall be elected to the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and to be consistent, by the third section of this bill Congress is asked so to determine, by the words, "there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or of any other right on account of race or color." Why not add nor on account of age, sex, or residence; and thereby subject this new State to be over-run and governed by the population of other States and Territories?

I for one enter my protest against any such pretended and attempted usurpation of authority. I would not vote for this bill but for the conviction that the section in question has no more validity than so much blank paper, and that so much of the bill as is valid is just and ought to pass that the people of Nebraska may be admitted as a State of the Union. The third section, of which I have spoken as void and an attempted usurpation, declares that—

This act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason of race or color.

If you should be able to give effect to this section you thereby say who shall be eligible to the office of Governor; you say by that who shall be eligible to the legislative and to the judicial offices of that State, contrary to the constitution of the people of the State, and forever after the State shall be admitted. I deny the right of Congress to do this. I would say once for all that this dual system of national and State government under the American organization is the secret of our strength and power. I do not propose to abandon it. I shall vote for the bill, protesting that the third section has no validity and ought not to be embraced in the bill, and from the conviction that the residue of the bill ought to become a law without delay in the interests of the people of Nebraska and of the Republic.

"But," gentlemen say, "other bills have been passed admitting States upon the condition that they should not allow involuntary servitude or slavery except as a punishment for crime." New States in that behalf were excepted by the very text of your Constitution. The language of that Constitution as it came to us provided that the power to continue that infernal traffic, the slave trade, should be exercised till 1808 only by the States existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. The attempt was made in the convention to extend this provision to the new States; but the proposition to that effect was voted down and rejected. There is therefore no justification in such restrictions against slavery in new States for what is attempted to be done here to-day.

It is urged also that States have been admitted upon the condition that non-resident citizens of the United States should be subject to no other or higher rate of tax than resident citizens or be denied the immunities or privileges of citizens therein. But this is simply a carrying out of that provision of the Constitution which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens" [of the United States] (supplying the ellipsis) "in the several States."

It has been urged also that States have been admitted with the condition that the public lands should not be subject to tax within the State. But, sir, the provisions of the Constitution declare that wherever the Government of the United States acquires property, even within the limits of an organized State, the Congress shall have exclusive jurisdiction in all cases over the same; and therefore such property of necessity is not subject to State taxation. Thus all these limitations have been imposed in strict accordance with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, in aid of, and not, as in this case, in violation of its express provisions.

Suppose, sir, to complete this new-fangled system of legislation, Congress should provide for the admission of a State "with the fundamental and perpetual condition" that it shall not enjoy as a State of the Union its equal representation in the Senate. The provision securing to the States equal suffrage in the Senate is no more obligatory than the second section of the first article, which declares the right of the people of every State every two years to choose Representatives in Congress by the votes of such persons as are qualified electors for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature as prescribed by State law, thus affirming the equal right of the respective States to prescribe the qualifications of voters at all elections therein.

If in an event Congress was to be allowed to alter the fundamental law of a State as to the qualification of electors or originally prescribed their qualifications, how comes it when the grant was made in the Constitution of the United States that "the Congress might at any time by law make regulations or alter State regulations as to the 'time, place, and manner' of holding elections for Representatives," that the power now claimed was not added—"and to prescribe or alter the regulations fixing the qualification of the electors?" The answer must be, because it was not intended to give to Congress that power.

The other provision of the Constitution is, that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the Legislature thereof. And if it is competent, therefore, for the Congress of the United States to impose any such condition as this upon this young State of Nebraska, it is equally competent for the Congress to impose that other condition, that said State shall have unequal representation or no representation at all in the Senate of the United States. Sir, the American people will never submit to it. By the sacrifice of life, by the sacrifice of treasure, that people have written upon the mountains and the plains of this land in letters of living light, never, I trust in God, to be erased, that hereafter all the States and all the people of this Union shall be equal before the law; that we shall neither have vassal States nor vassal men in the Republic.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to get the gentleman's attention to this point: suppose this bill should be so amended as to send this limitation of the power of the State back to the people of the Territory to be accepted, and it should be so accepted, I ask the gentleman whether in his opinion that acceptance by the people of a proposition submitted by Congress would be binding upon them after their admission as a State to secure the right of suffrage to all?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not believe it would at all, for the reason you cannot impose any condition on any State admitted into this Union as a perpetually binding condition save such conditions as stand with the text and spirit of the Constitution. The people of to-day in Nebraska have no power by contract to barter away the essential rights of the people of tomorrow in that State under the Constitution. I say it is essential to the life of the Republic that the will of the majority in every State should rule, subject to the limitations of the Constitution, unless forfeited by crime.

But in further response to the gentleman's question, in the language of the author of the "Spirit of Laws," the President Montesquieu, I would say "political liberty is a right of doing whatever the laws permit; and if a citizen could do what they forbid he would be no longer possessed of liberty, because all his fellow-citizens would have the same power." The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law; it is obligatory alike upon all the citizens and all the States, and forbids to be done what the gentleman would propose to do. It is the shield of our liberties, and we cannot consent to its violation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let me ask the gentleman but one question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not wish to be interrupted any further, as my time is limited; but if it is not to be taken out of my time I will answer with pleasure.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether, in his opinion, a majority has the right to deprive the minority of their fundamental rights?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman omitted to notice what I said in the opening of my remarks, that there was no limitation of the rights of the majority to exercise and control the political power in a State save that the constitution of the State should be republican in form of government and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States. That is a republican form of State government, and invades no fundamental rights, I apprehend, in which an overwhelming majority of the male adult citizens of the United States resident therein have exclusive control of its political power.

Mr. GARFIELD. How large a majority would my colleague call an overwhelming majority? What per cent. of the citizens of a State can be disfranchised before its constitution will cease to be republican?

Mr. BINGHAM. A majority as overwhelming, sir, as controls the political power of your own State. Does my colleague hold that the constitution of Ohio is not republican, or does he propose to reform it by act of Congress?

I see, sir, that some gentlemen here are very vigilant on this subject now who, when I ventured to assert long years ago that the majority should not discriminate against classes because of race or color, were then as dumb dogs. That has always been and now is my own opinion; the time is coming and I trust is not far distant when through the final action of the people—where this question alone belongs in every State of this Union—manhood, fidelity to the law, and citizenship shall be the only test of suffrage or eligibility to office.

But it is not the way to hasten this consummation so devoutly wished for to undertake to force it by act of Congress upon new States, and thereby degrade them and deprive them of their just equality before the law. While we stand by the other section of this bill admitting Nebraska into the Union as a State on an equal footing with the other States, we thereby give her no right to do wrong, but we secure to her the essential right of a government republican in form, adopted by her own people, and securing to the majority the exclusive right to govern.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask another question in connection with the last one. In the Territory of Nebraska, according to the information I have, there live citizens of the United States of African descent. When the initiatory steps were taken by the people of the Territory to frame the constitution here presented, they denied to that class of citizens any voice in determining any of the steps so taken resulting in the formation of this constitution. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether in his opinion that majority had the right to exclude from all participation in the first or initiatory steps taken for the organization of the government? And whether it is the right of the majority to say the minority shall have no voice in determining what the government shall be?

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, I answer the gentleman in the language of a profound statesman:

"There is no such thing as majority or minority without a corporate organization."
"A number of men in themselves have no collective capacity. The idea of a people is the idea of a corporation."

Those are the words of Burke, a man who was said to have "laid all nature under tribute." Standing upon his words, I submit that no majority spoke in Nebraska save in conformity to the act of Congress as declared in the preamble of this bill. What that majority did was expressly authorized by the act of Congress of March 21, 1864, and by his vote on that bill the gentleman may have authorized the very act to be done of which he now complains. Sir, men who live in "glass houses ought not to throw stones." [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, in the last Congress I was unable to vote for the enabling act which invited the people of this Territory to form a constitution preparatory to its admission as a State into this Union; for the same reason I was also unable to vote at the last session for its admission into the Union under the constitution now before the House. I confess some embarrassment as to what is clearly my duty upon the new phase which is presented in the case at the present time. With some little hesitation as to the soundness of the convictions to which I have arrived, and with no disposition to embarrass the action of the House or of the majority, whatever it may be in the judgment to which they shall arrive, I beg the indulgence of the House for a few moments as briefly as possible to give the reasons not only which induced my vote in the last Congress and at the last session, but which, as at present advised and unless convinced by the arguments which may be submitted hereafter, I shall be obliged to follow upon the present occasion.

I know of no act of the Congress of the United States more solemn than that upon which we are now about to pass. It is the creation of a State, breathing into it the breath of organic life, fixing its fundamental law for the present, and probably for the long future, under which its history commences, its prosperity or adversity begins, its career for glory or otherwise has its origin, its social institutions spring up. Its growth, its development, everything pertaining to its future as a State are involved in the question submitted to the House this afternoon. It is a question of no less importance to the United States themselves. It is introducing into the family of States a State upon an equal footing with all the other States of the Union, clothed in the other branch of Congress with the same power and with a proportionate power to the popular branch, sharing our legislation, helping to mold and shape the future destiny and career of the country as well as of itself, and assuming for the first time, upon the passage of this act, self-government for all future time.

It was wise, then, that the Constitution of the United States left this question as it has to the largest discretion of the people whose Representatives assemble in this body, untrammelled by any requisition, unlimited by any consideration except those under the Constitution from which they derive their authority, and which the present and future, enlightened by the past, shall light up the path of our duty. The Constitution says that "new States may be (not shall be) admitted into the Union by the Congress of the United States." It is, therefore, a question brought before us untrammelled by any consideration save those which we ought to bring to our deliberation here of the largest and the most comprehensive statesmanship of which we are capable. It should be decided upon no temporary expedient, upon no question of temporary policy. It is a work, however well or however ill we may perform it, that we cannot undo. It is a work for all time, and just as we shall perform it so it must remain, unaltered and unqualified, upon the statute-book of the country through the whole coming career and history of the Government.

Let us therefore weigh this question as becomes the Representatives of the people of the whole Government—this whole family of States—before taking into its embrace another upon an equal footing, sharing all the power, all the benefits, all the responsibilities, all the burdens which we bear here to-day. The policy which has governed the country heretofore is one of which I have no complaint to make here to-day—that of an early admission of States into this Union out of the new and constantly added territory of the Government whenever there has arisen therein a community, a body of people sufficient in number, in ability, in industry; with an organization sufficiently stable to bear the burdens and share the responsibility of a State. It has always been, and I trust always will be, the policy of this Government to admit them as soon as possible, at the earliest possible period that they shall manifest a disposition to form for themselves a republican form of government and come into the family of this nation.

I do not trouble myself about the effect of the relative strength of the old States. I yield to the power of numbers, as one of the Representatives of a section of this country that suffers relatively by the addition of new States from the western country continually. It will yield; as I have heretofore done and do again, to the ultimate and absolute power of the numbers who concentrate themselves in the great valley of the Mississippi, at the earliest practicable period. I hail these States as they come in. I welcome them into the family of States. Each one of them adds strength to the common Government, standing around this common temple, and bearing gladly upon their shoulders their share of the continually increasing expenses and burdens of the Government.

But, sir, the question of the time when these States shall be admitted into the Union depends also upon other circumstances. Sometimes, when the condition of things in a Territory is disturbed; when the administration of a territorial government is so uncertain, or so at war in spirit with the fundamental rights of the citizens of the United States; when there is such a failure in its administration, such a disturbance of society, and such a lack of ability for self-protection under the law, such a peculiarity in social institutions or in local laws as to require us sooner than otherwise to take them into the family of nations and prescribe for them, that they shall conform to the common law of the country, and the supreme law of the land, then it becomes the duty of the Representative to vote for an earlier admission of such Territory into the Union. Such were the conditions that governed Congress in the admission of Kansas into the Union; and such have been some of the reasons why the neighboring Territory of Nebraska has continued up to this time out of the Union—the lack of those disturbing elements which existed in Kansas, and which seemed to be beyond the power and control of the territorial administration, and only to be settled by the admission of that Territory as one of the States. But are any of those conditions existing touching the Territory of Nebraska or the Territory of Colorado? None at this time. I submit to the House, on the contrary, that such has been the legislation of Congress, and such is the administration of the law in the Territory of Nebraska, and I suppose also in the Territory of Colorado, that never in the history of territorial governments have the rights of the citizen, without distinction of race or color, been so guaranteed and protected, both civil and political, as they are at this hour in those Territories. The civil rights bill, which is above any territorial legislation or any adverse judicial decision in a Territory where our power is supreme, has guaranteed to him beyond peril every civil right known under the Constitution of the United States; and within one week past the same sovereign power of this Congress has guaranteed to him also every political right known under the Constitution of the United States, so that every citizen of the United States, be he high or be he low, be he white or be he black, of whatsoever name or nation or color or clime, to-day in the Territory of Nebraska enjoys, beyond the power of local laws or adverse judicial decisions, every right, civil or political, known under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DAWES. I will.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise for the purpose of withdrawing my motion to refer this joint resolution to the Committee on Territories; and I may be permitted to say here that I made the motion on Saturday, not from any hostility that I entertained to the joint resolution, but in order that there might be time allowed to the House to debate it, or to a committee to reflect upon it. There has been an hour allowed for discussion this morning, and there will probably be an additional hour allowed, and I have no desire that the bill shall be committed.

Sir, I voted for the admission of this Territory as a State at the last session of Congress, and I shall do so again. The constitution presented by the State of Nebraska is not exactly what I should desire it to be, but under the peculiar circumstances surrounding the case I shall vote to admit the State into the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] is now entitled to one hour on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will yield a short portion of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to conclude his remarks.

Mr. ROGERS. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio if he expects to allow any gentleman upon this side of the House to say anything upon this bill?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. All the speeches that have been made thus far have been against the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Every single one of those speeches has been made by a gentleman who expects to vote for the bill. We upon this side of the House have some rights.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will try to yield to some gentleman on that side.

Mr. DAWES resumed. In this condition of things we are asked to take from citizens of the United States resident in Nebraska and in Colorado the political rights guaranteed to them by an act of this Congress, passed not one week ago.

Mr. STEVENS. Is that act a law?

Mr. DAWES. So far as we are concerned it is the law; and I doubt not it will be the law long before the bill now under consideration shall become one. I felt that we had achieved something when over the objections of the President and by a two-third vote we secured to the colored men of this District the political rights we are now asked to take by the passage of this bill from a portion of the people of Nebraska.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DAWES. I would be willing to answer any question if I was not limited as to time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. But you are.

Mr. DAWES. I know I am. Now, to go on with my argument, if I could understand that we had got over this difficulty, if I could understand that the State constitution which the people of Nebraska have adopted and sent here, and which confines all political rights to white men, would be so modified by the last section of this bill if passed into a law, as to secure to all men equally those rights, then I would vote for this bill with great cheerfulness. If any one can convince me that by passing this bill we would secure the very thing which the people of Nebraska, in forming their constitution undertook to deprive the colored people of, I would go earnestly with every man in this House for the admission of that Territory as a State into this Union.

Now, under what circumstances is it that a constitution is brought here from the State of Nebraska, which by its very terms attempts to prevent anybody but white men from participating in the government of that State hereafter? At a time in the history of this Government, when the whole nation has been educated up to the belief and conviction that not only the true interpretation of the fundamental principles of government, but the absolute safety of our Government itself, requires the giving full and free scope to the Declaration of Independence, "that all men are born free and equal;" and that law, in whatever shape and form administered, "derives its authority only from the consent of the governed;" when we are struggling to reform the social institutions of the eleven rebel States and to bring them up to this standard, we are called upon in the same breath to take from these poor citizens of Nebraska the very political rights we sought only last week by a solemn act of Congress to clothe them with. I am told that there are not more than one hundred of these colored persons in Nebraska. The more the pity then; it shows the infernal hate of the negro which prompted it. It was from no well-grounded apprehension that the negro would ever influence the politics of the State. It was from pure desire—

Mr. BLAINE, (in his seat.) Pure cursedness.

Mr. DAWES. Well, "pure cursedness;" the purest desire to persecute and still further press down this unhappy race. The State reserves to itself the right to give to aliens the right to vote before they become citizens of the United States if only they are white. It can give the right to vote to a man who but yesterday landed from the ship which brought him from a foreign land, if only he be white. But under its constitution, which we are now asked to ratify, no colored man, whatsoever he may have done, however he may have testified by his blood his love for the country of his birth, can ever have the right to vote.

And further, this was done a year ago, and this State has been from that day to this knocking at the doors of Congress for admission as one of the States of this Union, and it has known all along that the only obstacle to its immediate admission has been the fact that by its constitution the black man is deprived of his political rights, and that its people could in ten days' time have removed every obstacle in the world to its admission as a State.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the gentleman suppose that that was the reason why President Johnson did not sign the bill which we passed last session for the admission of Nebraska?

Mr. DAWES. I do not suppose it was. But that is the reason the gentleman and myself have used for not voting for the admission of new States. Why, sir, eight years ago the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] stood shoulder to shoulder with me, and in words of thunder, unequalled by those of anybody else who participated in the debate—

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the gentleman will pardon me for interrupting him; but no such question at all arose on the bill for the admission of Oregon. The question then under consideration had regard to universal rights; and I stand to-day where I stood then.

Mr. DAWES. I was going on to say when the gentleman interrupted me that he then, in words of thunder, unequalled by those of anybody else who participated in the debate, opposed the admission of Oregon for this, among other reasons: "that no negro, Chinaman, or mulatto shall be allowed the right of suffrage" in that State.

Mr. BINGHAM. That was not the point.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, what has happened since that day? Have the events which have shaken this nation to its very foundation, and taught us, amid the throes of our country's peril, lessons which we perhaps never before appreciated, given us occasion to falter, to manifest less courage? The gentleman from Ohio and myself resisted at that time the admission of Oregon. I suppose he did it—certainly I did it—for that, among other reasons—because its constitution contained the provision I have read. We told the House of Representatives eight years ago, "Send that constitution back to the people of Oregon and in one month's time they will conform it to the requirements of the Constitution of the United States." And I say now, if we meet this question fairly and fully, this constitution which the people of Nebraska now present will in one month's time be conformed to the principles of our republican system.

But, sir, there is attached to this bill a section which, it is supposed, is sufficient to save our consciences—not sufficient to save the rights of the poor black men in Nebraska; for in the discussion of this question, on this floor and elsewhere, I have not heard any man express the opinion that this section has the slightest force or effect. What does it provide?

That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise, or any other right, to any person, by reason of race or color.

Now, sir, that provision of course is not a part of the constitution of the State, for if it were it would be unnecessary to put it in this bill. The bill does not propose that this provision shall be made a part of the constitution of the State. As has been well said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] the only power that we have to interfere with the constitution of Nebraska, or any other State after its admission into the Union, is the power which we derive under that clause of the Constitution which imposes on us the obligation to "guaranty to each State in the Union a republican form of government." What is the extent of this power?

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to correct a mistake of his before he goes further?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. The mistake which the gentleman has made has been in reading from his own speech instead of mine. [Laughter.] I spoke against the provision of the Oregon constitution, which denied to colored citizens, not the right to vote, but the right to live in the State or to hold property therein, or to prosecute a suit in its courts either for the vindication of a right or the redress of a wrong. Of the right of the majority to regulate the suffrage I spoke as follows:

"Of my resistance to the passage of this bill, sir, and to the enactment into a law of this Oregon constitution, let no demagogue say that it is a mere negro question, and for making a negro equal, politically, with a white man. I ask no change of the law as it is written in the Federal Constitution. I leave the States as that Constitution leaves them, free to regulate the elective franchise among citizens of the United States; to extend it to or withhold it at their pleasure from all colored citizens, or only some of them; from all minors, white or black; and, if they see fit, from the best portion of the citizens of the United States—from all the free intelligent women of the land. But I protest against the attempt to mar that great charter of our rights, almost divine in its conception and in its spirit of equality, by the interpolation into it of any word of caste, such as white or black, male or female; for no such word is in that great instrument now, and, by my act or word of vote, never shall be."

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman is mistaken in supposing that I read an extract from my speech. I was a little too modest to do that. I read from the constitution of Oregon, and not one word from any speech. I stated to the House that I opposed the admission of Oregon for that among other reasons, that her constitution contained that provision; and I supposed the gentleman from Ohio opposed her admission on the same ground.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman made a mistake; that is all.

Mr. DAWES. Well, it is not the first time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no, not at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I must have mistaken the gentleman this morning when I understood him to pronounce a section of this bill palpably unconstitutional, and yet to declare his intention to vote for it.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman did misunderstand me. I pronounced that section void, and therefore said that I would vote for the bill with or without the section, because it is of no more effect than so much blank paper.

Mr. DAWES. I did not, I believe, misunderstand my friend from Ohio when he declared just now that he persisted in the position taken in his speech on the admission of Oregon against allowing the Constitution to be marred with the word "white."

But, Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that the third section of this bill is not a part of the constitution of Nebraska; because if it were it would not be necessary to insert it in the bill. The bill does not propose to make the provision a part of the constitution of the State. Our only warrant, then, for interfering is under the authority to "guaranty to each State in the Union a republican form of government." But to "guaranty" does not mean to prescribe; to "guaranty a republican government" does not mean to impose upon a State a form of government, for the very essence of a republican form of government is that it shall have the consent of the governed. And, sir, under this very bill, as was cited by the gentleman from Ohio before, we pronounce the constitution to be republican in form. We declare it conforms to the Constitution. We declare it comes up fully to the measure of that obligation of the Constitution upon us to interfere. And there is no power to interfere when we pronounce it republican in form.

If, therefore, what is obvious and admitted, this "fundamental condition" contained in the third section of this bill of admission is neither a part of the constitution already, nor proposed by the bill to be made a part of it, nor yet enacted under authority of the clause guarantying republican forms of government, the bill reciting that the constitution is republican in form without it, then, by what authority and for what end is it enacted? Is it proposed by force of the enactment of Congress to prescribe the qualification of voters in Nebraska after she becomes a State? By the construction of the Constitution from the foundation of the Government that is beyond the power of Congress. The exercise of this power has been left from the origin of the Government with the States. No one claims this power in the present instance. Under what authority, I repeat, is it proposed to enact this provision? I hope that the singular proposition just advanced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] that Congress makes the constitution of the State of Nebraska, needs no answer before those who believe that the very essence of a republican government is that it is made by those it governs.

It is gravely asserted at the other end of the Capitol, in support of this proposition, that the Senators and Representative of that State, by taking their seats under this act, give, as the agents of the State, its assent to this condition, and thereby make it a part of the organic law of the State. But when and where did the people of Nebraska make these three men their agents to enact or fix organic laws for the State? Not these men, but a convention was elected to make this constitution, and the people passed upon it themselves as it is now, not as it is proposed that it should be. These men were chosen for another purpose. Besides, if they could be agents for such a purpose, still they are expressly instructed by the very terms of their commission against giving any such assent. The very constitution under which they came here expressly declares that none but white men shall vote. It is beyond the power of their agents to assent.

It is further said that this section is at least the expression of the will and purposes of Congress, which must be regarded. I admit that it is an expression of the wishes of Congress, but not of its purposes, and as an expression of its wishes I appreciate it and regard it as a great gain. But we are dealing with organic law, not with the wishes of Congress, which may change with the hour. But will it be regarded? I propose an amendment submitting this proposition to the voters of Nebraska and you reject it: her Senators and Representatives here reject it. They have known for nearly a year that all opposition to their admission would be silenced in a moment if they would but strike the word white out of their constitution, and they have persistently refused. But refer this to their voters. Say to them, you shall not come in until you strike out the word white from your constitution and clothe all men with political rights, and you give to them and the world not only an expression of your wishes, but also of your purposes, which will be understood and heeded. You would never have another State come here with the word white in its constitution. You would also make one grand stride toward that measure to which you must come sooner or later, and the sooner the better—the incorporation of impartial suffrage into the Constitution of the United States, the supreme organic law to which every citizen and every State must bow.

I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to permit me to offer the following amendment:

Sec. 4. Be it enacted, &c., That this act shall not take effect until said "fundamental condition" shall receive the assent of the legal voters of said Territory, either upon direct vote or by convention legally assembled for that purpose, as shall be determined by the Legislature thereof; and the same shall be certified to the President of the United States by the proper certifying officer of the Territory. And it is hereby made the duty of the Governor of said Territory, within sixty days from the passage of this act, to convene the Legislature of said Territory to determine the mode and manner of taking the assent or dissent of said voters to said condition; and it is also made the duty of the secretary of said Territory to forthwith certify the result to the President, and of the President, by proclamation, to proclaim said result without delay to the people of the United States.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I cannot yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts any further. I have given him already nearly three quarters of an hour.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the gentleman would give me as much time as I needed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I cannot yield any further.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not understand that the previous question has been called.

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to know whether the gentleman from Ohio then has the right to claim his hour before the previous question has been seconded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was entitled to an hour on the motion to refer. When that hour expired the motion to refer was withdrawn, and the gentleman is speaking now on the bill itself. There is no hour after the previous question has been seconded, because the bill does not come from any committee.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. In the brief period of three minutes I do not expect to argue the question, and can only state some of the reasons why I shall vote against the bill.

The privilege, sir, of being admitted as a State into the Union is one of inestimable value, and those who ask to be so admitted should come in white robes, pure and unspotted. We have a right to inquire whether the parties come up to the standard we now proclaim to the world or not. This constitution of Nebraska excludes all but white citizens from the elective franchise, and that, in my opinion, is an insuperable obstacle to immediate admission.

Then, in the next place, I find the third section conflicts with the first. The first section admits the State, without any conditions at all, "upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever;" while the last proposes fundamental and perpetual conditions, that the act shall take effect with no "abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise, or any other right, to any person by reason of race or color, (excepting Indians not taxed.)" This is correct doctrine; but they have already made their fundamental law and denied these rights to some of their own citizens. It will raise a question for the courts, and I prefer not to go into the courts at all on such questions. Being now within our control it is far better to keep them there.

We ought to make our laws on this subject symmetrical, making such rules that we shall be willing to admit a dozen States out of the Territories in the Northwest upon the same terms as would be satisfactory in the case of the southern States; for I cannot myself see why there is any necessity to have one rule in one case and a different one in another. Let the rule be just, but uniform in all cases; otherwise we shall have precedents that hereafter may be very embarrassing. If we may trust the people of Nebraska to perform "a condition-subsequent," why not the people of Georgia or Louisiana?

Mr. Speaker, there is no sort of hurry about the matter. And we are not sure there is population enough in the Territory to warrant her admission as a State. The new railroad, it is said, will soon add largely to her population. Railroads are all very well, but they are not exactly the equivalent of population. Let us welcome Nebraska, but not until she is ready, as I have no doubt she soon will be. In my judgment, a Territory to be admitted as a State should have a population sufficient at least for one member of this House. It should have at least fifty thousand, while I do not believe, from the information we have, that in the present case there is over forty thousand. I know of no census which has been taken by which any one can speak of the number of her population with any authority, and before Nebraska is admitted there ought to be an authentic census, if for no other purpose than to see whether she has a sufficient number to support a State government. A State government is a very considerable burden for a small number of people in a new country.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I now yield five or ten minutes to my colleague.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I think the objection which has been urged by those who oppose the admission of this Territory upon the ground there will not be secured to the persons of African descent in that State when admitted the right to vote is well taken. In other words, if in the mind of any member it be sufficient reason for the rejection of this application that by her admission under this act persons of African descent will not in law be entitled to vote, then I think such member ought to vote against this bill, because in my judgment the proviso which has been added to the bill will not under the law secure the end its purport indicates. The reason for that is, sir, as was remarked by one gentleman, it does not make this a part of the constitution, nor is there any method, legal I mean, by which the Congress or the Government of the United States can, if Nebraska shall refuse to conform to the suggestions contained in this proviso, enforce that proviso.

Now, then, when I have said that it seems to me, if I am not mistaken, I have suggested a vital objection, it is no answer to that objection that we are attempting to legislate in reference to the control of the right of suffrage within a State. We will not have controlled it; that will not be the effect of this proviso.

Now, let me suggest right here that these objections that have been taken on the ground that we are attempting to legislate for a State upon the matter of suffrage are not well taken, because we are now legislating about a Territory and not a State. Hence it must not be said that this proviso is, on that account, in conflict with the second section of the first article of the Constitution, to which my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] alluded.

The next suggestion I wish to make is the one which relates to the most common objection made to this proviso and to the admission of this State with this proviso in it. It is that the proviso itself not being a thing within the power of Congress to legislate upon so as to make it a law according to the Constitution is doing a vain and an absurd thing. That is the most grave objection that I have really heard to this proviso. It is not, however, it seems to me, a vain thing to do; and the reason that it is not so is the same that has operated again and again upon the minds of perhaps one half of the Congresses that have ever legislated upon the admission of a State into the Union. It is not a vain thing, because the moral sanction and effect of this proviso will have potency and force, not in the way of being a law, but by being vastly persuasive and influential in controlling the action of the Territory that is admitted to become a State upon the terms contained in the proviso.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask if the moral sanction would not be as great or as effective by rejecting the application now as it would be by incorporating a null and void provision?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I answer certainly; and if, as I said a moment ago, I occupied the position of my friend from Vermont, that it is a good and sufficient reason to refuse to admit a State because there are one hundred people in it that will be temporarily disfranchised, then I would be compelled to vote with him. But I deem the persuasive effect and force of this proviso sufficient to secure the universal enfranchisement that we on this side of the House desire; and hence I can vote for the bill, although this section, known as the EDMUNDS amendment, will not become a law by reason of it being inserted here. Now, the moral force and persuasiveness of this clause, as it appears to me in the light of the past as well as the present, is this: that it becomes a matter of moral obligation on the part of these people to conform their legislation to the fundamental conditions upon which their members have taken their seats in this House and their States have been admitted into the Union.

Let me refer to an example or two bearing directly upon this point. I have already stated that perhaps a majority of the Congresses that have legislated on this subject have legislated in exactly the direction that this proviso points. Take an example that I happen to have before me, the admission of Missouri into the Union. In the act of admission of that State on the 2d of March, 1831, which will be found in the United Statutes-at-Large, page 645, you find this provision, which is identical in the regard in which I am looking at the matter with the proviso before the House.

"That the State of Missouri shall be admitted into this Union upon the fundamental condition [adopting the very language of this proviso] that the fourth clause of the second section of the third article of her constitution shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and no law shall ever be passed by the State of Missouri in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either the States of the Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any privileges or immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States."

There, then, is a State admitted into the Union upon the fundamental condition—subsequent, if you please, that she shall not thereafter ever pass any law of a given character. But it is said, what if Missouri should violate that fundamental condition; are you going to turn her out of the Union? How are you going to enforce this provision? I answer as I do in this case, that there is no way of enforcing it except by the moral forces which belong to the action I have suggested.

My friend before me suggests what is pertinent, that this subject-matter is one coming within the Federal powers and jurisdiction. Now, that is no reply to what I am saying, because I am arguing that there is no way for Congress to compel conformity to the fundamental condition. The conformity would have to be compelled, not by turning the State out of the Union, not by turning her members out of Congress, but by simply appealing to the courts to know whether the law passed by the State was or was not constitutional. And, let me remind gentlemen, that appeal to the courts would be exactly as effectual without this fundamental condition as with it. And hence I point to the act admitting Missouri as a case showing, not that the condition becomes the law, but showing the judgment and sense of the former Congress in putting such terms into the act for admission that they might have the persuasive moral force that belongs to those acts.

As my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] well knows—for he is very learned in such matters—in the only act ever passed for the admission of our own State of Ohio, there was inserted a provision that for five years after the State should be admitted into the Union certain lands within the limits of the State should not be taxed. Now, let me ask gentlemen is not that matter of taxing lands a matter coming within State and not within Federal jurisdiction? Is not that a case of equal force with the one now before the House?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will yield to my colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] more of my time to allow him to conclude his remarks.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I hope my colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] will allow my friend near him [Mr. BINGHAM] to say what he now desires to say.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Very well.

Mr. BINGHAM. In the hurried remarks I made a short time ago, apprehending that the discussion would take the direction it has taken, I called attention to the very cases my colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] has cited, and I called the attention of the House to the fact that in every one of those cases there were remedies in the courts. And I now assert here that in regard to the lands of the United States reserved from taxation in any State organized and admitted into this Union, there is a remedy in the courts to enforce that reservation. But what I assert here in regard to the political powers of the States is that there is no such remedy in any of the courts. And in the remarks which I submitted I myself cited the provision of the Missouri act, and showed that it was an enforcement of the express text of the Constitution of the United States, "that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." But I deny that it ever was enacted that the citizens of the United States are entitled as such to the privilege of voting in any State. That is the privilege of the citizens of an organized State, and it is the privilege of nobody else; a privilege limited only by the will of the majority.

And now I come back to the point from whence I started: that this provision added by the Senate to the bill of last session is perfectly nugatory, because there is no tribunal on this earth, save the Congress of the United States, that can take jurisdiction of any case arising under it. My colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] has well said that Congress cannot well expel the State. And I add that the Thirty-Ninth Congress cannot by its acts bind the power of the Fortieth Congress to act; nor can the Fortieth Congress bind the Forty-First Congress. Therefore, as I said before, this last section is void. For that reason, and that reason only, I will vote for this bill with it in, as I would without it.

Mr. SHELLABARGER resumed the floor.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I desire to ask the gentleman if in his opinion there is any difference in the legal effect of the provision under consideration whether it be contained in the bill admitting Nebraska into the Union or contained in the constitution of the State? In other words, could not the people of the State of Nebraska, immediately after its admission into the Union with a constitution containing this provision, change their constitution so as to deny the right intended to be conferred by this provision?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The question of the gentleman, from Indiana [Mr. HILL] is a pretty long one, and I do not know that I can remember all of it. If I understand his question, the first part of it is whether there would be any difference in the legal effect of having this conditional provision enacted here by Congress in a law and having it incorporated into the constitution of the State of Nebraska? I answer that there would be just this difference: if it were in the constitution of Nebraska it would become binding and operative; if it were in the act of admission it would have only the moral force I have stated. As to the last branch of his question, whether the people of Nebraska could not in any event change their constitution if they chose so as to disfranchise a portion of the people there, I answer that they could.

Mr. WILSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] answer a single question?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON of Iowa. The gentleman has referred to the proviso attached to the act admitting Missouri. My recollection of that proviso is that it required the State Legislature by a solemn public act to declare an affirmation of that condition.

Now, I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question in connection with the suggestion of the moral obligation which would rest upon the people of Nebraska under this provision. If we should propose to the people of Nebraska a condition in the same terms as that submitted to the people of Missouri, and if the Legislature of Nebraska should give its consent, thereby ratifying the condition, would not the moral obligation resting upon the people of Nebraska be greater to carry out in good faith the terms of that proviso than it would be in the case of the condition proposed in this bill, to which their assent is not asked in any manner?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I answer, Mr. Speaker, that it is not my recollection that in the Missouri act to which I have referred there was any provision for asking the assent of Missouri to the fundamental condition which I read. My recollection is exactly to the contrary. But, however that may be, I can answer the part of the gentleman's question as to which would impose the greater moral obligation. I think that the course of proceeding stated by him would impose, if possible, a more distinct and definite obligation than will be imposed in this case.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Would it add to the legal effect?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. It would not add to the ultimate legal effect.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, in his view, the condition imposed by Congress in the case of Missouri was in conflict with any provision of the constitution of Missouri as presented?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. In my opinion it was. It was supposed to be in conflict with and would modify one of the provisions of the constitution of Missouri. The condition imposed by Congress was for the purpose of changing the effect of that clause of the constitution, or if not to change its effect, to exclude and prevent a certain construction.

Mr. STEVENS. As I understand, it was a construction of a part of the constitution of Missouri.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Still it was a fundamental condition that certain legislation should be had.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I resume the floor, and yield to my friend from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] one minute.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the admission of Nebraska when the question was up before, because her constitution contained the word "white." I find that there is a great difference of opinion among legal gentlemen as to whether the provision attached to the present bill will control the action of the State when admitted. After listening to and weighing, so far as I am able, the various arguments presented to-day, I have made up my mind to vote in favor of this bill. Sir, emigration is flowing to that Territory, and in view of the progress of enlightened sentiment, neither Nebraska nor any other State can long retain in her constitution this objectionable provision.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] with the understanding that he will call the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I do not vote for the admission of Nebraska except for the reason that I think the condition of the country justifies if it does not demand its admission at this time. There are many things in the condition of the Territory and some things in the constitution presented which I do not like; but I waive them in consideration of higher and stronger reasons for her admission. I do not vote for the admission of Nebraska with the idea that the exclusion of colored men from the exercise of unrestricted political power is to be permanent. On the contrary, I am impressed with the belief—indeed, it is in my mind a conviction—that this disqualification must be speedily removed. I regard this as an inevitable result. The exclusion is in deference to the traditions of the past. It has no foundation in positive reason or public interest. The time is not distant when all parties will concur in the perfect enfranchisement of the colored race in all parts of the country. The situation of Nebraska, its increasing population, the development of its material wealth, the loyal sources from whence its emigration must come, and the laudable ambition which prompts its people to assume the responsibilities and powers of a State, make it certain to my mind that they will voluntarily recognize the demands of the age and secure to all people, without distinction of race or color, by irrevocable public law, a complete and perfect enfranchisement. Hence, though it is an objection, it does not outweigh the stronger and broader reasons for admission.

Mr. Speaker, there is more in this bill than appertains to the admission of Nebraska. It involves a principle which I concede is novel, but which is within the power of the General Government, and the exercise of which will hereafter be imperatively demanded.

It is mainly to the discussion of that principle that I propose, for the few minutes I am permitted to occupy the attention of the House, to direct my remarks.

The admission of a State to the Union, as has been well said, is one of the highest duties which can be exercised by Congress. It is a right entirely within the discretion of the two Houses of Congress and the executive department of the Government; that is to say, within the discretion of the law-making power of the Government. And, sir, we have the power, in the exercise of that right, to refuse admission or to impose conditions, or to admit without condition. And that constitutional right has been exercised since the foundation of the Government.

The State of Vermont was excluded from the Union of the States for several years, and was finally admitted on the condition that she should pay to the State of New York the sum of $40,000; the historical charts of that period state that Vermont was admitted upon that condition, and the facts justify the belief upon which the people of that State acted, that unless they had paid this sum to New York upon some disputed question of boundary, the justice of which Vermont always denied, Vermont would not have been admitted to the Union at that time; and some of our people imagine that this payment was the foundation of the marvelous prosperity which has since blessed New York. [Great laughter.]

The most violent contest of our political history grew out of efforts to deprive States claiming admission of privileges enjoyed by many of the States of the Union, exactly as we propose in this case. Missouri was not admitted, except in company with the State of Maine; and Maine was denied admission except upon condition that Missouri should become a State. Congress not only fixed this condition upon Missouri, but imposed other conditions affecting the rights of future States in nearly half the territory we then occupied. For more than a quarter of a century this balance of irreconcilable political interests was maintained by the rejection of all States, South or North, unless their admission should be so regulated as to perpetuate the equilibrium between freedom and slavery, which had been established. The momentous results that followed the war with Mexico, the acquisition of the Pacific coast, the discovery of gold in California, the unprecedented creation of new States, and the prohibition of slavery by an uncontrollable popular will dissipated the equilibrium which had been maintained so long, and led us through the terrible history which is too familiar to us all, to the question now before the House, the condition upon which we are willing to admit Nebraska into the Union.

These conditions, I will agree with gentlemen, are expressed in the act of admission; but they will be as palpable to the students of history as that expressed so clearly in this bill if it shall become a law. Hitherto the terms of admission have been settled before the fact, and the statutory recognition of the new State marks only the result often reached through great tribulation and peril.

But a new age enforces the necessity of new precedents and principles of action, and the time has now come when the conditions upon which a State shall be admitted to the Union, or restored to political power, must be made in express terms in the act of admission or restoration by the law-making power. And if I ever spoke a solemn word in my life it is now, when I say the reorganization of this Government can never be safely effected except it be upon conditions irrevocable by the States which may be the subjects of its legislation and expressed in the act of admission or restoration. Take, for instance, South Carolina. Suppose she applies for admission to the Union, or restoration to political power. She exhibits to Congress a constitution that embodies every principle which may be regarded as necessary to admission, and she is admitted or restored by unanimous consent of Congress and recognized by all the departments of the Government, and the very next day after her admission she changes every provision in her constitution and makes such a constitution as would make it impossible for any member of this House to give his consent to her admission; what, then, are we to do? Is the exercise of such power one of the reserved constitutional rights of South Carolina? No, sir; I think not. We have the right to say to South Carolina, in my opinion, or to any other rebel State, that when restored to power she is restored to power upon certain express conditions imposed by Congress or by the law-making power, which should be expressed in the act of restoration and made irrevocable by that or any other seeking admission or restoration; and she violates such conditions at any time we have the power to proceed against her in such manner as in our judgment the public safety may demand.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen debating this question carefully limit their objections to one consideration, and that is whether a condition of this character imposes upon the State an obligation or duty that can be enforced in a court of law. I will admit if we pass this bill the condition made fundamental, and in consideration of which many of us vote for this bill, cannot be enforced in a county court of the State of Nebraska; but I do not look for the interpretation of the political rights of the Government or the administration of public law to any county or State court, nor even to the judicial opinions of the Supreme Court. Why, sir, the very ground taken in this debate will enable, if it does not justify, the courts in exercising political power to such an extent as to deprive the people of this country of the control of their own Government. If the people have no rights and Congress has no power except such as may be recognized and confirmed by courts of law, then we give to courts of law the political and administrative powers that belong exclusively to the people of this country, which are indispensable to the safety of their Government, of which they alone are judges, and which the courts of law ought to enforce and not to overthrow.

There are two powers necessary to the efficient and wise administration of the Government: first, the power vested in courts, which operates between man and man, to which we all bow when restricted to its legitimate sphere; and second, the administration of political power, which the courts of the United States cannot and ought not to control, and that power is vested in the representatives of the people in the administrative rather than in the judicial departments of the Government, and can be applied whenever it is necessary to their safety in the admission of new States or the restoration of insurgent States to the Union. What is necessary to their safety it is the right of the people to determine. They cannot be held to the admission or recognition of States upon such conditions as will lead to the destruction of the Union, and this gives them the right to determine what is necessary to their safety. It is the mission of courts to administer the laws and not to organize or control governments; that belongs to the people.

Let me turn for a moment to the principal question presented in this bill. I need not restate in exact terms the condition it imposes, but upon Nebraska gentlemen know what it is. They say this condition is invalid; that it is of no effect. I concede that it is not in the form of law, such as might be administered in the courts of Nebraska. It is not presented in the form of statutes which are submitted to the interpretation of lawyers and the decision of judges. But then it is not among the subjects submitted to this judicial arbitration. It is a clear statement of the conditions upon which Nebraska may become a State of the Union. It shows what Congress deems necessary to a republican form and to the safety of the Government.

Similar stipulations have been imposed, either in precedent, action, or in express terms, in the admission of other States. Nebraska is not compelled to enter the Union upon such terms; but if she accepts admission when so tendered she will be held to an observance of the act by which she is admitted. The act of admission is not by any means the finality to the power of the Government in this or in similar cases. If this bill be passed with this fundamental provision, and she does not conform to that condition, she can never be regarded as acting in good faith toward the Government and people of the United States. What they would or should do I cannot say. It may be that no extraordinary measures would be taken in this case. The laws of Congress have sometimes been disregarded by States; but if any Congress hereafter should deem this observance of this condition essential to the public safety, and the State even after admission, should continue in violation of its provisions, or enact laws in direct conflict with the condition, Congress would have a right to declare such action a violation of solemn duty and an act of bad faith to the Government and people of the United States, and to take such measures to enforce its rights as the people might deem necessary to their safety. The rights of the Government in such case would be the same as if the State had accepted the condition previous to admission. She could not claim the rights of a State and disregard the solemn stipulation of the act by which she became a State.

Let me take the case of an insurgent State. Suppose we had admitted Tennessee upon condition, expressed in the act of restoration, that she should maintain for a limited period her laws which excluded the enemies of the United States from political power, and that after restoration upon this condition she should reinstate in power implacable public enemies, would not the Government have the right not only to declare that she had acted in violation of the law, but to reject her Representatives and Senators, and if need be send the Army of the United States there to enforce the rights of the Government? Sir, if Congress represents the political and administrative power of the Government, and admits a State upon a condition indispensable to its safety, and that State accepts its privileges knowing the condition upon which they rest, and subsequently organizes a government in opposition to it, the Government has an indisputable right to resume the power which it conferred; without this the Government cannot maintain its authority or its existence.

Mr. STEVENS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If in the act admitting her you do not make it a condition, can you ever make it afterward?

Mr. BANKS. It makes no difference whatever; if we impose the condition of admission of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks, and admit her upon that condition, whether or not the State accepts it before admission, she assumes her position of one of the States of the Union with a knowledge of the terms upon which it is granted, and is as much bound by them as if she had accepted them before the admission. No explanation of that condition will strengthen the rights of the Government under the act of admission. We admit her upon a condition which we have a right to impose, which the interest of this country demands, and which the people will sustain, and if she violates it she must suffer the consequences in precisely the same manner as if she had violated an accepted condition. I thank God that this great question in which the future peace of the country is involved arises, not in regard to an insurgent State, but a Territory that is loyal, people that are patriotic, and a State, if it becomes one, which will fulfill all its duties. But if hereafter this question shall arise in regard to the restoration and readmission of the insurgent States, and they shall be able to affirm that the Government has no right to impose conditions, or imposing conditions it has no power to enforce them, from the moment that doctrine is accepted the Government of the Union is at an end. It is in the hands of its enemies and will be destroyed.

Mr. STEVENS. One single word. Does the gentleman make no distinction between free Territories and conquered Territories?

Mr. BANKS. I make a distinction, a wide distinction; but so far as this principle is concerned the supremacy of the Government of the United States is one and the same in the loyal and disloyal Territories.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BANKS. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] has required me to do so, I call the previous question. I do it not upon my own, but upon his motion.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 65, noes 62.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, and Mr. GLOSS-BRENNER.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 67.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. ALLISON. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed.

No objection was made.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of Adin Nordyke, A. Wolcott, W. H. H. Rader, and 23 others, citizens of Princeton, Indiana, praying that there may be no curtailment or reduction of the national currency, &c.

By Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio: The petition of John Riley, of Toledo, Ohio, praying that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to issue American register or enrollment.

Also, the petition of Dennison Steele, of Toledo, Ohio, and George Berriman, of Erie, Pennsylvania, asking that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to issue American register or enrollment.

By Mr. BUCKLAND: The petition of George W. Wenger, and 87 others, citizens of Springfield, Clark county, Ohio, against the curtailment of the national currency, and against compelling national banks to redeem their circulation in New York.

By Mr. DENISON: The claim of Hon. John Reichard, for money unlawfully collected by the internal revenue collector of the twelfth district, Pennsylvania.

By Mr. ELIOT: The petition of Sewell H. Fessenden, and others, of Massachusetts, praying that coal may be admitted free of duty.

Also, the petition of Nathaniel Cobb, of Kingston, Massachusetts, and 500 others, praying for an amendment of the Constitution securing to all citizens in States and Territories equality before the law.

By Mr. FARQUHAR: The petition of T. J. Taylor, J. G. Kennedy, and others, of Aurora, Indiana, against further curtailment of the national currency or contraction of the present volume of currency, as injurious to the banking, manufacturing, and mercantile interests of the country; also against compelling national banks to redeem their notes in the city of New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances.

By Mr. HOLMES: The petition of G. B. Mowry and others, citizens of West Eaton, New York, against any curtailment of the national currency, and against the enactment of any law compelling national banks to redeem in New York.

By Mr. MORRILL: The petition of Ebenezer

White, Jacob Young, Samuel Hodge, Aaron Beede, Robert Sargent, Samuel McMaster, Perley Powell, and John G. Clogston, soldiers of the war of 1812, of Stratford, Vermont, praying Congress to grant them a pension, and setting forth their reasons therefor.

Also the petition of C. L. Barber, and 61 others, citizens of Castleton, Vermont, praying for passage of tariff bill as it passed the House of Representatives at the last session.

Also the petition of Samuel Ross, and 70 others, citizens of Castleton, Vermont, praying for passage of tariff bill the same as passed the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: The petition of James Whaley, Alexander McClean, and Charles Williams, soldiers of the war of 1812, praying for the passage of a law allowing them pensions from the date of their discharge.

By Mr. MORRIS: The petition of R. M. Morris, Esq., and many others, of Springwater, Livingston county, New York, approving of the tariff bill agreed upon by the joint committee of wool-growers and manufacturers, and which passed the House of Representatives at its last session, and asking the immediate passage of the same into a law.

Also, a like petition, signed by J. C. Shelton, Esq., and many others, of West Bloomfield, Ontario county, New York.

Also, a like petition, signed by G. Arnold, Esq., and various others, of Conesus, Livingston county, New York.

Also, a like petition, by D. C. Snyder, and numerous others of Springwater, Livingston county, New York.

Also, a like petition, signed by the supervisors of the county of Yates, in the State of New York.

Also, a like petition, by F. P. Shelton, Esq., and many others, of New Bloomfield, Ontario county, New York.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The petition of Hon. J. L. Alcorn, of Mississippi, praying that certain moneys arising from tax on cotton may be set apart for repairing levees on the Mississippi river.

By Mr. PAINE: A memorial of the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Justices of the supreme court, State officers, and 100 citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of a pension law for the benefit of the soldiers of the war of 1812.

By Mr. RANDALL, of Kentucky: The petition of Henry H. Hunter, of Knox county, Kentucky, for a pension in consequence of an injury received in the military service of the United States.

By Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania: The petition of Charles Valence, for the payment of his pension from the date of his discharge.

By Mr. SCHENCK: Subduty petitions of officers of the United States Army, praying for the restoration of fifty cents as the commutation price of the ration.

By Mr. WARD, of New York: The petition of 70 citizens of Alleghany and Cattaraugus counties, in the State of New York, in favor of a constitutional amendment giving equal and civil political rights to all men.

Also, a petition of numerous citizens of Addison, New York, in favor of compelling all national banks to redeem their circulation in New York city, and for other purposes.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

The following notice for leave to introduce a bill was given under the rule:

By Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania: A bill for the relief of Charles Valence.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 15, 1867.

Prayer by Right Rev. THOMAS M. CLARK, D. D., Bishop of Rhode Island.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be dispensed with by the unanimous consent of the Senate. Is there any objection to the motion?

Mr. SUMNER. I think we had better not dispense with the reading of the Journal at this period of the session. The Journal should be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is very long to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the reading of the Journal will be proceeded with.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the Journal, but, before concluding, was interrupted by Mr. CONNESS. I move to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is suggested that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with. It can only be done by the unanimous consent of the Senate. No objection being made, the further reading is dispensed with.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Governor of South Carolina, inclosing the credentials of Hon. James B. Campbell, chosen by the Legislature of that State as a Senator for the term commencing March 4, 1867; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and been requested to present to the Senate the petition of the Norwich and Worcester Railroad Company, through their president, respectfully asking Congress to reduce the impost duty on iron rails used for railroads to one half of a cent per pound in gold; on steel rails for railroads to one cent per pound in gold; on iron tires and axles to one half of a cent per pound in gold; on steel tires and axles to one cent per pound in gold; and on all frogs, crossings, and plates made of steel, and used exclusively for railroads, to one cent per pound in gold. As the committee having charge of this subject have reported a bill, this petition, if there be no objection, will be received and laid upon the table.

Mr. LANE presented a memorial of Dempsey Reece, praying to be relieved from any further performance of his contract to carry the mail on route No. 12068, between Newcastle and Mechanicsburg, in Indiana; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILLEY. I offer the memorial of certain citizens of West Virginia, asking Congress to propose for ratification to the several States an amendment to the Constitution substantially to the effect that no inequality among citizens on account of birth, race, color, previous inequality, or previous non-residence beyond the preceding year, shall be made or recognized by the laws of the United States; also to remove, by immediate legislation, any such inequality from the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the ten unrestored States, and to take all necessary measures for peace, order, justice, and the security of life, liberty, and property in the same. I ask its reference to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

It was so referred.

Mr. WILLEY. I also offer the memorial of certain citizens of West Virginia, praying Congress to refrain from the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or having in view the return within a limited time to specie payments; and also praying Congress to refrain from the enactment of any law compelling the national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting national banks from paying and receiving interest on bank balances. I ask that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

It was so referred.

Mr. BUCKALEW presented two petitions of journeymen cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars of the second and fourth congressional districts of Pennsylvania, praying for a specific tax of five dollars per thousand on domestic cigars, and that the present tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged, and that Congress will alter the present system of stamping by selling the stamps to the manufacturers at five dollars per thousand, and increase the penalty for violating the internal revenue laws; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of the artists of Boston, in which they ask for the imposition of a specific duty on imported oil paintings of $100 each, with an addition of ten per cent. on the excess of value above $1,000 each. They say that this will increase the revenue of the Government and afford a needed protection to native art. In presenting this petition I deem it my duty to say that while I sympathize with its object I doubt seriously whether the petitioners do not ask for too large a specific duty on foreign pictures. I ask its reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it had better be laid upon the table. All matters of that sort relating to the tariff should now be laid on the table, because the committee have reported on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I agree to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be laid upon the table if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the petition of colored citizens of Norfolk, Virginia, in which they set forth their grievances at length and very precisely indeed. They say that the civil rights bill is not enforced, and that they have not the protection which it promised; that the juries are all filled by rebels and against them; that they are shut out from the schools for which they are obliged to pay taxes; that they cannot purchase land for the land owners will not sell them; and that they are even shut out from the grave-yards which formerly were open to them. They ask for suffrage, thinking that if that were granted, they would in some measure be able to apply a remedy themselves. I ask the reference of this petition to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

It was so referred.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented a memorial of the State Historical Society of Iowa, praying for a modification of the postal laws so as to permit postage on pamphlets, papers, documents, and books forwarded to historical societies and public libraries to be paid on delivery, and that the postage on such papers, documents, &c., be reduced fifty per cent. below the present charges to such societies and libraries; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. MORRILL presented a memorial of the mayor and recorder of Georgetown, District of Columbia, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 395, relating to the aqueduct bridge of the Alexandria Canal Company over the Potomac river at Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. HARRIS presented eight petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of Michael Mangan, late a private in the sixth Wisconsin infantry, praying that he may be placed on the same footing as private soldiers in regard to bounty or that he may be allowed an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin and Michigan, praying for such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will prohibit any inequality among its citizens on account of birth, race, or color; which was referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of Wisconsin, praying the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested to present the memorial and resolutions adopted at a large meeting of citizens of Bellefontaine, Ohio, praying that Congress may, by suitable legislation, exclude from holding office any person who is in the habit of drinking spirits to excess, and may make, as a cause of removal from office, the exhibition of any person in a state of intoxication while holding an office under the Constitution. I have no doubt that the principle of this memorial if adopted would save a great deal in the administration of the Government, and it ought, in my judgment, to be applied to every officer of the Government; but as it is a constitutional question, I suppose it is beyond our reach except by an amendment to the Constitution. I move that the memorial be referred to the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, which I believe has the subject of removals from office under consideration.

It was so referred.

Mr. PATTERSON presented a petition of citizens of the United States, remonstrating against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency or the return within a limited time to specie payments, and against any law compelling national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting national banks from paying or receiving interest on bank balances, and also suggesting a reduction of the liquor tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have a communication in the nature of a petition from the employes of the Washington arsenal, in which they say:

"The undersigned, in behalf of the civil employes at Washington arsenal, beg leave respectfully to call your attention to what they believe to be an accidental omission in the joint resolution giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government.

"The word 'arsenal' has been omitted while provision has been made for the Government employes at the 'navy-yard,' and in all other branches of the civil service in Washington.

"We believe that it is manifestly an unintentional omission, as we think the House of Representatives could not have intended to exclude us from the benefits conferred upon other civil employes.

"There are now employed at the arsenal about one hundred and thirty men, including clerks, master workmen, mechanics, and laborers. The highest per diem received by any of them is $4.50, and the greatest amount paid to any of them for civil service either as salary or per diem during the past year was less than $1,100."

I ask that this paper may be referred to the Committee on Finance, who have the joint resolution to which it refers in their charge.

It was so referred.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of the journeymen cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars of the third congressional district of Pennsylvania, praying for a specific tax of five dollars per thousand on domestic cigars, and that the present tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged, and that Congress will alter the present system of stamping by selling the stamps to the manufacturers at five dollars per thousand, and increase the penalty for violating the internal revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a petition of Isaac H. Sturgeon, praying for the passage of an act to authorize the North Missouri Railroad Company to import certain railroad iron free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLEY presented a memorial of the trustees of the Foundry Methodist Episcopal church of Washington city, praying for authority to sell certain lands in the limits of the city; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 493) supplemental to an act to establish the Treasury Department, approved the 2d of September, 1789, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 457) to provide for the defense of the northeastern frontier, reported in favor of printing the bill, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 505) to authorize the trustees of the Foundry Methodist Episcopal church to sell and convey square No. 235 in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DEBTORS IN THE DISTRICT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 218) exempting the property of debtors in the District of Columbia from levy, attachment, or sale on execution; which were as follows:

In line twenty-four, after the word "library," insert the words "not exceeding in value $400."

Add to the bill the following proviso:
Provided, however, That this act shall not in any manner interfere in the collection of debt or in the enforcement of any contract made prior to the passage of this act, and shall apply to cases founded upon contract only. The officer charged with the execution of any writ of attachment or execution shall ascertain the value and amount of provisions to be allowed to any family under this act by summoning three householders of the District, who shall be first duly sworn by such officer faithfully to perform their duty, and proceed to set apart the provisions necessary for the debtor's family, according to this act, if such provisions be found on the premises or in possession of the debtor; and if not, they shall make out and return to such officer the value of such provisions, and the same shall be allowed in any property of the debtor.

Amend the title of the bill by striking out the word "the" where it first occurs, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "certain."

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the bill and the amendment be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH INTERVENTION IN MEXICO.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution, which I offered a few days since in regard to Mexico, instructing the Committee on Foreign Relations to make some inquiries and report upon the subject embraced in the resolution to the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the resolution be read. The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. HOWARD on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate the present relations between France and the republic of Mexico; the extent, both with respect to population and territory, of the successes of Maximilian in his endeavors to overthrow that republic; the amount and character of his military force, including his French auxiliaries; the action of the executive branch of the Government of the United States in reference to the intervention of France in the affairs of Mexico, including any treaty or project of treaty proposed, assented to, or recommended by our minister to France with a view to a settlement of the difficulties between France and Mexico; the present prospect of the withdrawal of the French troops from Mexican soil, and the probability in the case of such withdrawal of Maximilian being able to maintain his standing there; and that for the purpose of such inquiries said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Is the motion to refer?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has just been read.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOWARD. It is a resolution instructing the Committee on Foreign Relations to make these inquiries.

Mr. SUMNER. The motion now is to take it up.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I withdraw the motion to refer if it is not taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not necessary to withdraw it. The motion now pending is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution. It is not yet before the Senate. The question is, will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection to its consideration, though if it should be taken up I shall move an amendment to it.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; let us take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate at any length on the subject of this resolution, and yet I think it due to the country and to Congress that the resolution should pass. There has been a state of war existing in Mexico since 1862. It sprang into existence in consequence of disagreeing parties in that republic, and an attempt on the part of one of these parties to overthrow the republican government of Mexico, as established by her constitution and to establish another government in its place. In this condition of things the Emperor of the French saw fit to intervene and to espouse the cause of one of the parties, whose object was the overthrow of the republican government long established there.

The pretext for this wanton, totally unauthorized, and unjustifiable intervention on the part of the Emperor was the undoubted fact that the Government of Mexico was indebted in a considerable amount to certain French subjects, and that the republic had not been able to pay the amount of their claims. Ostensibly the cause of the war on the part of France was the enforcement of this claim; but nobody can for a moment doubt that that indebtedness was but a hollow pretext for this bloody and wanton war. Its object must be looked far beyond that claim. The intervention looked to the complete subversion of the republican government in Mexico and the establishment there of the imperial power of France under a protectorate which the Emperor had seen fit to extend to Maximilian, who, by his advice and connivance, was called at the head of affairs in Mexico by what is commonly known as the priest party.

The Government of the United States have not thus far, as I understand it, made any very strenuous efforts, either by diplomacy or otherwise, to procure the withdrawal of the French forces from Mexico. The war has been raging for years, and has been prosecuted by the French army with great bitterness, and in some cases with great barbarity, if we are to credit the rumors brought to us by the journals of the country. I do not, however, propose to enter into the character of the war. What I want to know, and what I think the country desires to know, is the present exact political and legal posture of the republic in regard to the Government of the United States and in regard to the Government of France. The state of war has interrupted our trade with Mexico; it has greatly involved our relations with the legitimate Government of that republic; and our own interests, the interest of our commerce, the interest of our own citizens, the interest of mankind generally, require that it should be brought to a speedy close. We are not informed to what extent the imperial forces have succeeded in subjugating the people of Mexico; we do not know to-day how many towns or cities they hold in their possession, or how important may be the conquests they have made; and I have been waiting with great patience and a feeling of great personal indulgence to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body for some report, some statement by which I could learn the exact posture of affairs there. I think the same anxiety has filled the breast of more than one Senator.

The country and the world have been amused for the last fifteen or eighteen months with occasional rumors that the French army were about to be withdrawn from Mexico, and that consequently the usurper Maximilian would retire again to his home, the people of Mexico be left to enjoy their own sovereign right of self-government in their own way, and peace be thus restored. I am without faith in these rumors. I wish to call the attention of Senators, and especially of the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to a few facts in this connection.

As long ago as the 10th of April, 1864, the Emperor of the French entered into a solemn convention with Maximilian in regard to the amount of force the Emperor was to furnish to him in his expedition to Mexico. I hold in my hand a document, containing several of the articles of that convention. They read as follows. I desire the attention of Senators to the convention, so that there shall be no misapprehension in regard to the conventional relations existing between the Emperor and Maximilian, and no mistake as to how far the Emperor is bound to continue his military forces in Mexico. Articles one, two, and three of this convention read as follows:

"ARTICLE 1. The French troops which are now in Mexico will be reduced as soon as possible to a corps of 25,000 men, including the foreign legion.

"This corps, to protect the interests which have caused the intervention, will remain temporarily in Mexico, under the conditions arranged by the following articles:

"ARTICLE 2. The French troops will evacuate Mexico according as his Majesty the Emperor of Mexico shall be able to organize the troops necessary to replace them.

"ARTICLE 3. The foreign legion in the service of France, composed of 8,000 men, will, nevertheless, still remain for six years in Mexico after all the forces shall have been recalled, conformably to article two. Dating from this moment, the said legion shall pass into the service and pay of the Mexican Government. The Mexican Government reserves to itself the faculty of shortening the duration of the employment of the foreign legion in Mexico."

It is plain from this that the continuance of the French forces in Mexico depends entirely upon the will and the interests of Maximilian himself. The Emperor of the French stipulates to furnish him with at least twenty-five thousand French troops, and this force is to remain in Mexico so long as he desires. At all events, whatever disposition may be made of a portion of this large force by Maximilian, the Emperor is bound by his contract to permit his foreign legion to remain in Mexico for at least six years from the date of the convention. That would be until the 10th of April, 1870. Now, sir, I have yet to learn that this convention has in any respect been altered or modified by the consent of the two contracting parties. I know that we have had many rumors that the French troops were about to depart. We had a story during the last summer, and we were told, if I remember rightly, that the whole of the French forces would be withdrawn by the 1st of November; but instead of this rumor being verified by the facts it turned out that France was increasing her force in Mexico and sending additional regiments to uphold the tottering throne of the adventurer.

I will not pursue the subject but a step further at this time; I do not deem it necessary; but I wish the learned chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to give this subject his most earnest attention, and to inform us whether there be not some means by which the friendly intervention of the Government of the United States may be speedily used for the restoration of peace to Mexico and independence to the republic.

Sir, we have been, according to my apprehension, on the very point of recognizing the authority of Maximilian as Emperor of Mexico. I call the attention of Senators to a very small portion of the diplomatic correspondence which has passed upon this subject. The French version of our relations with France is best stated in a paper in the Memorial Diplomatique, published in Paris, under date of March 12, 1865. The document bears upon its face very strong evidence of being official, or at least semi-official. Allow me to read a passage or two from it. The writer says:

"As soon as the note of the notables of Mexico, conferring the crown upon the Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian of Austria, had by the subsequent adhesion of the ayuntamientos obtained the legal sanction of the country, the French diplomacy made it its duty to assure itself of the true dispositions of the American Cabinet in regard to the new empire of Mexico. President Lincoln and Mr. Seward, at Washington, as well as Mr. Dayton, at Paris, did not cease to assert the well-defined purpose of the Government of the United States to respect the results of the free vote of the Mexican people."

Here comes the passage to which I desire attention:

"They added"—

Who? The President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, and Mr. Dayton, our minister at Paris—

"that out of regard to France, whose friendly sympathies for the Union were confirmed by her scrupulous neutrality in the war between the North and the South, President Lincoln, in case of reelection, formally promised to enter into diplomatic relations with the Government of Maximilian if he was generally recognized by the other Powers of Europe and America."

I believe he has been so recognized.

"The best-informed American journals agree in stating that President Lincoln only awaited the date of the renewal of his functions on the 4th of March to recognize officially the new Mexican empire; and this recognition positively decided upon and making a part of the political programme of the Government at Washington, will no doubt establish without delay between the two countries relations of perfect understanding and neighborliness."

"Never in its discussions has the Cabinet of Washington allowed to transpire the slightest allusion to the Monroe doctrine."

And in this respect I believe the writer is entirely correct—

"still less has it from this leading point made reserves implying any right whatever in the internal affairs of Mexico. In effect the last attempt at conciliation between the confederates and the Federals have revealed to us that the initiative tending to prop up the Monroe doctrine does not belong to the Government of the North, but to that of the confederates, who, in a common undertaking based upon this doctrine, saw means of bringing back the opinion of the population of the South to ideas of conciliation and Federal unity."

Now, sir, I wish to know by a formal, solemn report from one of the standing committees of this body, whether it be true in point of fact that Mr. Lincoln or Mr. Seward or Mr. Dayton or any other accredited organ of the United States has ever proposed, directly or indirectly, to recognize the authority of Maximilian, Archduke of Austria, as the legitimate or even de facto ruler or governor of the republic of Mexico or any portion thereof. I wish to know how far this intrigue has proceeded and who are parties to it. While I say this, however, I am bound to say in truth that our minister, Mr. Bigelow, in Paris has upon more than one occasion intimated, in terms which could not be mistaken, his willingness, nay, his anxiety to recognize the authority of Maximilian as the Emperor of Mexico.

I beg to take one more step, sir. The paper from which I have read was one of the inclosures contained in the dispatch of Mr. Bigelow, the American minister at Paris, dated March 4, 1865, numbered 55; and Senators have seen what were the views then taken of this subject by the French Government, if the paper itself from which I read can be regarded a proper exposition of those views. In the inclosure from which I have read you will see that there is a positive statement implicating the American Secretary of State in the plan to recognize Maximilian. There it was written and printed in plain terms. On the 28th of March, 1865, only a few days after that dispatch was sent by Mr. Bigelow to Mr. Seward, the latter writes him the following dispatch, to which I call the attention of the Senate:

SIR: Your dispatch of the 14th of March, No. 55—

Which contained the inclosure from which I have just read charging the President and the Secretary of State of the United States and the American minister at Paris with favoring a recognition of the imperial government of Maximilian in Mexico—has been received, and I have read with much interest the papers which accompany it—

That is, this paper which I have read—and which illustrate the disquietude now prevailing in Paris.

Fortunately, I have in my dispatch of 15th inst., No. 71, explained to you the views and sentiments which our military and political situation suggests. We want our national rights. We are not looking for ulterior national advantages or aggrandizement, much less for occasions for retaliating in other forms of hostility against foreign States. We are not propagandists, although we are consistent in our political convictions.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

JOHN BIGELOW, Esq., &c.

Making no allusion whatever to this distinct allegation contained in the Memorial Diplomatique of a purpose on the part of our Government, including him by name, to recognize the authority of Maximilian; omitting all notice of it, passing it over in silence as if it were a matter utterly unworthy of his notice.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to inquire of my friend whether it is customary always or expedient for the representatives of our Government to undertake to reply in so many words to statements of anonymous writers in journals however respectable? The Memorial Diplomatique, as the Senator well knows, is simply a journal conducted by eminent writers, but I do not know that it can be entitled to a different kind of consideration from that which is bestowed upon other journals.

Mr. HOWARD. It is unnecessary for me to answer the question put by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts specifically. It is sufficient for me to say that the Secretary of State in other cases has seen fit to take notice of similar articles from publications sent him as inclosures by our minister to Paris. Whether it be usual among diplomats is another question. This charge was a grave one, involving the honor of his Government, and well worthy of his attention and solicitude. But, sir, the Secretary says:

"Fortunately I have in my dispatch of 15th inst., No. 71, explained to you the views and sentiments which our military and political situation suggests."

I know not where to find this dispatch of the 15th of March, 1865, No. 71. The document has not been, so far as I am aware, laid before Congress, and has never yet seen the light. Congress are, I believe, in ignorance at present of the contents of that very important dispatch of the 15th of March, in which the Secretary of State had "fortunately explained his views and sentiments in regard to our military and political situation." I may possibly be mistaken as to the fact that this dispatch has never been published. I have searched for it diligently, however, and have thus far been unable to detect it, although there was an express call made upon the President as long ago as the 11th of December, 1866, requesting him "to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, all correspondence, not yet officially published, between our Government and that of France, touching the occupation by French troops of the republic of Mexico and the establishment of a monarchy there." I ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations whether he has ever seen that dispatch of the 15th of March, 1865?

Mr. SUMNER. I do not recall it by its date.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is an unnecessary mystery hanging over the whole subject of our relations with Mexico and her relations with France—a mystery which ought to be solved. Our interests as a nation, as a sister republic, older by birth and stronger in every way than Mexico, require, it seems to me, a full and complete narration of all the material facts involving her in the present imbroglio with France. I hope the learned chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations will for a few days, or a few hours at least, pretermit that attention which he has been giving to other subjects, very necessary and very praiseworthy to be sure, and endeavor to enlighten the Senate and the country upon the historical, diplomatic, and political status of Mexico. I think the people of the United States, as well as the people of Mexico, will thank him for it.

One word further, sir, and I have done. We have had various rumors of a settlement with Mexico, and among these rumors was this: that the United States were endeavoring to bring about a peace by purchasing from Mexico, or rather from Juarez's government, a large portion of the republic, including Lower California and Sonora, and, as a consideration, to pay to the Government of the Emperor of the French some twenty-five or thirty million dollars in satisfaction of its claims. Of course I do not know how much foundation there may have been for this newspaper rumor; but just here I beg to be indulged in saying France has prosecuted a war against that republic for four years and more. She has thus far utterly failed of success in her project of subjugating the people, and utterly failed of obtaining the indemnity for French citizens which was the pretext of the war. The subject of the war was the claim of France for indemnity for her citizens. Upon that subject and for that end she has waged this long, bloody, and wasteful war. She has seized—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall be through in a moment if the Senate will indulge me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the Senator from Michigan will be allowed to proceed with his remarks, and the order of the day will be laid aside informally.

Mr. HOWARD. I assure the Senate I shall occupy but a moment longer.

She has seized the ports of Mexico; she has confiscated her revenues; she has drenched her soil with blood; she has made it necessary for the republican government of Mexico to enter into obligations of indebtedness which must hereafter weigh heavily and oppressively to her people; and notwithstanding the gigantic efforts made by the Emperor of the French to convert Mexico into a French province, he has failed; and if to-day, or if at any time, France withdraws her troops from Mexico and abandons this war which she has thus cruelly and unjustly waged, I hold it to be one of the principles of the law of nations and the law of war that the subject of the war, to wit, the indebtedness on account of which it was waged, has become extinguished, and that France can never hereafter resume the war on account of the same subject-matter. She of her own motion took out an execution against poor Mexico to levy a debt. She resorted to the last remedy of kings in the prosecution of the debt. She has failed. Sir, the debt is dead and extinguished. The subject of the war passes into that oblivion and amnesty which is always implied by a peace, whether the peace be established by treaty or by the mutual cessation of hostilities. And I say here in my place that such a treaty on the part of the United States as I have alluded to, a treaty by which we should seize upon a large portion of that republic and out of the avails of which we should satisfy the French Government in respect to the indemnities she has claimed, would be an outrage upon the feelings of the American people and a gross departure from the plain principles of the law of nations.

I invite my friend's attention to this branch of this subject. It is one of great importance. Can the United States, by paying France this debt which she has claimed, and thus recognizing the justice of the war she has made upon Mexico, stand up in the presence of the other nations of the world and claim not to have been dishonored?

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has opened a great question—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will consider the order of the day as laid aside if no Senator calls for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made, that will be considered the understanding of the Senate.

Mr. McDUGALL. I shall not object if it is understood that the order of the day is to be laid aside until this discussion is concluded. I object if the purpose is simply that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall make his discussion and that conclude the debate, as I choose to participate in it myself if I have the opportunity. If the debate is to be continued until its conclusion I shall consent.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object to that.

Mr. McDUGALL. Then I object to laying aside the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the Chair considers it his duty to bring before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SUMNER. With the permission of the Senate, I would state that I propose to move an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Michigan, and I had better give notice of it now. It is to insert after the word "Senate" the words "if in their opinion this inquiry and report shall be deemed expedient;" so that it shall read, "the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate, if in their opinion this inquiry and report shall be deemed expedient." By that amendment this resolution will be brought to a certain extent in harmony with the usage of the Senate. Without that it would certainly not be in such harmony. If the discussion be renewed I shall have something to say upon it, though I should have no objection to the resolution with the amendment I proposed going to the committee.

Mr. McDUGALL: I propose to offer a substitute for both the resolution and amendment; and as the subject may come up for discussion hereafter, I desire to present it now, and for this reason: it was my good fortune some years since to be upon the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I introduced resolutions of inquiry before that committee on the subject of French intervention in Mexico. The chairman of that committee did not think it prudent to have the subject considered; and claiming the right to direct the order of business never allowed it to be considered as long as I was on the committee; and so long as it is sent to that committee subject to their discretion it will never be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is Senate bill No. 453.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 715) setting aside certain proceeds from internal revenue for the erection of penitentiaries in the Territories of Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 453) to regulate the tenure of offices, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HOWE to the third section of the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, before the question is taken I propose to submit to the Senate some remarks in answer to what was stated yesterday by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] The Senator from New Jersey, if I understood him aright, referred to a passage from Story's Commentaries, which he considered as showing that the power vested in the Executive of appointing to and removing from office was a very dangerous one in a Government like ours, and he thought that it was proper to call the attention of the Senate and the public to the opinion of Mr. Justice Story, because the President of the United States had deemed it proper to cite from the same commentator upon the Constitution several paragraphs, and also from a number of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison, and from Keht's Commentaries, for the purpose of showing that in a Government like ours the tendency to the usurpation of power was more strongly exhibited in the legislative department than in either of the other departments into which it is divided.

Whether the President was right or was not right in referring to these passages upon the occasion of his veto of the District suffrage bill is a matter about which there may well be differences of opinion. My own impression, as I stated a few days since, was that it would have been better in a message relating to that particular bill to omit any discussion of the question whether the abuse or usurpation of power was more to be apprehended from the legislative than from the executive department of the Government. I did not, however, understand my friend from New Jersey as meaning in the reference which he made to other passages in Story to deny that there does exist a greater tendency to abuse or usurpation in the legislative department than in the executive or judicial; and still less did I understand him as referring to the passages which he read to the Senate for the purpose of showing that there was any inconsistency between the doctrine of the commentator referred to by the President and that to which he called the attention of the Senate; and there is none.

Mr. Justice Story, as well as the author of the number of the Federalist referred to, was considering the theory of such a popular Government as we have, divided into the three branches which all the writers upon political law tell us it should be divided into in order to secure freedom—the theory as to the tendency of each of those branches respectively to usurp power; and they all of them came to the conclusion—Mr. Justice Story and Chancellor Kent, as well as Mr. Madison, in the Federalist—that the danger of abuse or of usurpation of power was more to be apprehended from the legislative department than from the executive.

I could add nothing to the reasoning of the men to whom I have referred to make good that opinion. I think their reasoning is controlling, and I do not understand that my friend from New Jersey disputes it; but he says, and says properly, as everybody who has written on the Constitution has said from the beginning of the Government, and as was said while the Constitution was under consideration in the Convention, that the President may abuse some of the powers with which he is clothed. There can be no doubt about that; and the particular power which it is imagined he may abuse and may have a disposition to abuse is the power to appoint officers, and the power which has been heretofore recognized to remove, without the consent of the Senate, officers who have been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

As far as relates to the power of appointment, my friend from New Jersey has not failed to consider that that may be abused by the Senate as well as by the President. The power of appointment of all constitutional officers, that is, those whose appointments are specially provided for by the Constitution, is not in the President alone. He can only exercise it (except in the case of a vacancy during the recess) with the approval of the Senate. The Senate, therefore, are just as much the appointing power as is the President in relation to all such officers. If, then, the possession of such a power carries with it a tendency to abuse in its exercise, that tendency is just as great in the Senate as in the Executive.

The reasoning in support of the proposition that there is danger in clothing the President with the power of appointment is that he may use it for the purpose of rewarding favorites and continuing party ascendancy to accomplish his reelection. That is all true; but it requires no particular foresight to see that each one of those motives may operate upon the Senate, if not collectively, individually.

In a Government like ours parties must exist; the Senate therefore must necessarily be divided into parties, formed because of the adoption of different political principles either in relation to the construction of the Constitution or in relation to matters of mere expediency. How the Constitution is to be construed as regards the powers which it may be supposed to contain, and how the powers which may be granted with the assent of all are to be exercised, are matters about which there will be differences of opinion. And that the fact is so is illustrated by the position of the Senate now, and has been from the commencement of the Government to the present time. There are now in the Senate but very few who concur in what has been called "the policy" of the President, which was neither more nor less than the policy of his immediate predecessor, in the steps which have been taken to restore into the Union for all purposes the States which attempted to escape from it. A large majority of the Senate are of a different opinion; and they think that that is a subject vital to the interests and to the safety of the United States.

Now, what is the purpose of this bill? The President, it is said, has removed officers and appointed others in their stead because the first were adverse to his policy and the last are not; and it is said that he has been governed by the same motives in appointing to offices which have become vacant without the exercise by him of his power of removal. Their names are sent here, and what says this bill? The Senate, supposing that under the administration of his immediate predecessor nearly all the offices of the Government were held by men who favor what is termed the congressional as distinguished from executive policy, if the President removes men of that description we will not only not confirm those whom he appoints to take their places, but if he removes and appoints as successors those who have been nominated and rejected by the Senate they shall not receive any salary, and every officer of the Government through whose hands the money is to pass from the Treasury in the payment of the obligation of the Government who pays the salary to such a man is to be punished criminally. That is this bill.

Why is that? Why does the Senate desire to take to itself that power? Why does the Senate charge as against the President an abuse of the power of appointment, founded upon the fact that he appoints those who concur with him instead of those who concur with Congress and differ from him? It is only because the Senate think proper to exercise the power of appointment which is in them to attain some political end or some party end, and to secure the continuance in power of the political party in the country to which they belong. And if my friend from New Jersey would, if he has not already done so, recur to what has been said by some of the lights who carried the Government through in the beginning of its existence, he would see that there is such danger to be apprehended from the conduct of the Senate in this particular as from the conduct of the President. In this connection I wish to read from a letter written by the elder Adams to Mr. Sherman, a member of the Convention from Connecticut, in reply to one which he had received from that distinguished man, stating that he thought there would be very great danger to be apprehended from vesting the power of appointment in the President alone, and insisting upon it that there should be associated with him either the Senate or some other tribunal by way of a check, so as to guard against the abuse into which he might fall. Mr. Adams, after admitting that the President might through ambition exercise the power of patronage which the sole authority would give him, if the sole authority was vested in him, as he thought it should be, objected to associating the Senate with him, and used these words:

"A Senator of great influence will be naturally ambitious and desirous of increasing his influence. Will he not be under a temptation to use his influence with the President as well as his brother Senators to appoint persons to office in the several States who will exert themselves in elections to get out his enemies or opposers, both in Senate and House of Representatives, and to get in his friends, perhaps his instruments?"

There are several other passages in this letter which are full of instruction, and were intended by way of warning to members of the Convention. It is published in Pitkin's History, but I read it from the second volume of the last edition of Story on the Constitution, page 394, where the greater part of the letter will be found. It does not apply to us, I know, for we have not any ambition; we do not want to get enemies out of office; but if Mr. Adams is right it may be in the future, though not in the present, that each individual Senator of those constituting the majority may be very anxious to keep his enemies out and to get his friends in; of course Mr. Adams meant political enemies and political friends, and with a view to accomplish both results a Senator may be very anxious to have appointed to office only his own friends, who will minister to his own purposes, or, to state it in the stronger language of Mr. Adams, who may be his mere instruments to serve the purposes of his ambition.

The whole, then, results in this: that the tendency to abuse of the appointing power, as that appointing power now exists, is just as great in the Senate as it is in the President. That abuse may be caused precisely by the same causes which may originate the abuse on the part of the Executive. In the beginning of the Government, as we all know, the power was sparingly exercised. In the debate of 1789 Mr. Madison admitted that the power of removal might be abused, and that to remove without good cause (that good cause, as he said, consisting only in the want of competency or faithfulness on the part of the officer) would be a good reason for impeachment; but that doctrine has fallen—I suppose some of my friends will say in the progress of liberty. General Washington turned out very few, and appointed in no case except upon a conviction of the fitness of the particular person appointed. Of those who immediately succeeded him Mr. Adams turned out almost as few; Mr. Jefferson rather more, but still very few; and such continued to be the conduct of the Executive until the period of General Jackson's administration; but up to that time nobody doubted that the President had a right to remove, whether the officer was appointed by himself alone or by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The doctrine was received as one settled from 1789 down to the period when General Jackson assumed the presidential office. We know how he came into it. He was one of the three returned to the House of Representatives in 1828, when there was no person elected by the people, receiving a majority of the electoral votes; and in that contest Mr. Adams received the proper vote of the House under circumstances which caused almost a convulsion in the United States. He was voted for by Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, although as it was said, and I suppose correctly said, if the question had been submitted to the people of Kentucky, as between Mr. Adams and General Jackson, General Jackson would have received ninety votes out of every one hundred. But Mr. Clay, in the discharge of a duty which he thought he owed to the public—and nobody who knew him as well as I knew him could doubt the purity of his purpose—exercised the power with which the Constitution clothed him, and gave his vote for Mr. Adams. General Jackson was elected at the succeeding election by the people and re-elected. He had a strong hold upon the people. Under his command the war of 1812 had terminated in a blaze of military glory. The result of his great battle was then unexampled and has never been exampled since—I mean in relation to the disparity between the killed and wounded on each side. That gave him a deep seat in the hearts of the American people, and they justified almost everything that he was disposed to do or did.

And how did he administer this power? It is stated in a note, which I have no doubt is perfectly authentic in its facts, to be found at page 404 of the same volume of Story and the same edition before referred to, that he removed six hundred and sixty-four officers. The most of them were removed before he was re-elected. Who found fault with him? His political opponents found fault with him, not upon the ground that he had not the power to remove, but upon the ground that it was an abuse of the power. He went before the people a second time, and he was re-elected by an increased majority. The people, therefore, according to the doctrine which says that the people when they decide in favor of a President who has been before in office settle finally what the true construction of the Constitution is and what the true policy of the Government is, decided in that instance that the true construction of the Constitution in this particular is that the President is clothed with the power to remove, and that the true policy is to exercise that power, carrying out the doctrine announced in this Chamber by a very distinguished son of New York, afterward Secretary of War and Secretary of State, equally distinguished in both characters, that "to the victors belong the spoils," a mischievous doctrine, in my opinion, as a political doctrine looking to the true interests of the country. But nobody then doubted or ventured to question General Jackson's authority to make those removals; and the bill upon your table, Mr. President, admits that the power is necessary; for what difference is there, so far as relates to the power, between suspending an officer for a time and taking from him the salary attached to his office during the whole period for which he is suspended and removing him altogether? That suspension is provided for by this bill, so that the friends of this measure—including, of course, my friend from Oregon—admit by the very bill itself that the true interest of the country requires that there should be vested somewhere an authority to get rid of an incompetent officer and that it should be vested during the recess in the President.

Now, I have said all that I propose to say in regard to the remarks submitted by my friend from New Jersey; and I have next something to say respecting what fell from the Senator from Oregon. In the first place, that honorable Senator assails the authority of Mr. Madison upon these grounds, which he supposes he has made good: first, that it stands in opposition to the authority of General Hamilton, and secondly, to the authority of the Supreme Court. It is true that as far as relates to General Hamilton, in the number of the Federalist to which the Senator referred, it was stated by that very distinguished man that the power to remove being incident to the power to appoint, and the power to appoint being vested in the President and Senate conjointly, the power to remove could only be exercised conjointly. Now, I speak from recollection, but I am sure it is a recollection which does not fail me, when I say that, after General Hamilton had been in the Government as Secretary of the Treasury and had been an anxious spectator and a student of the measures adopted by the Government from time to time, engaged in all the great political controversies that ensued even after he ceased to be the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, he changed that opinion. He saw that the practical working of the Government demanded that such a power should be vested in the President if the Senate was not in session. He yielded to the reasoning of Mr. Madison, and he not only yielded to the reasoning of Mr. Madison, but yielded to the fortification of that reasoning which experience, after the power was held to exist, demonstrated to be the true policy of the Government and the true construction of the Constitution.

I beg leave to say to my friend from Oregon, with all respect, that he has entirely misapprehended the cases in the Supreme Court to which he referred. He first cited the case of Marbury vs. Madison, reported in 7 Cranch; which I understood him to say decided that it was not in the power of the President to remove. There is no such doctrine in that case. Just at the close of the Administration of Mr. Adams, he having appointed justices of the peace for the District of Columbia under a law which limited their services to four years and required the appointments to be passed upon by the Senate, and the Senate having confirmed the particular nominations, among others that of Marbury, Mr. Adams signed the commission and sent it to the State Department, and there it was found when Mr. Madison became the Secretary of State, as he did upon the inauguration of Mr. Jefferson as President. Marbury applied to the Supreme Court of the United States for a writ of mandamus against Mr. Madison to compel him to deliver to him that commission.

There were two questions before the court: the first was whether the court had power to issue a writ of mandamus in such a case as that. The act of 1789 gives the Supreme Court only the authority to issue that writ and the other writs which it mentions when they become necessary to the exercise of their own jurisdiction, and that is generally an appellate jurisdiction—their original jurisdiction is limited to a very small class of cases—cases between the States, cases affecting foreign ministers and ambassadors. The court went beyond the mere question of their power to issue a writ of mandamus in that case, and for so doing were not censured as the Supreme Court in modern days has been; I mean the judges who decided the case of Dred Scott upon the ground that the immediate question decided by them was not necessary to be decided in order to dispose of that case. Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the whole court, enters into a labored argument, able as a matter of course, because he never labored in vain, for the purpose of proving that the office was vested in Marbury and that he was entitled to his commission; but concluded the opinion in a few sentences by stating that the court had no jurisdiction under which they could grant him redress in that form or perhaps in any form; certainly not in that form. The opinion in that case has never been assailed by either lawyer or judge upon the ground that that part of it was extra judicial, and yet it was just as extra judicial as was the opinion in the Dred Scott case. Marshall had been baptized in the blood of the Revolution; he had served his country as diplomatist and as Secretary of State; he had illustrated the Constitution in judgments that challenged the admiration of the whole country; and no one ventured to assert, as against an officer of that description, that any improper motive, any desire to trench upon the legitimate power of the Executive, entered at all into the consideration of that judgment.

But, says my brother and friend from Oregon, that case decided that the President had no right to remove. Surely that is an entire misapprehension. The Constitution gives to the President the authority to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to certain high offices, but gives to Congress the power to vest the appointment and to give the removal of inferior officers to anybody they think proper; and these justices of the peace were inferior and not high officers within the meaning of those two terms in the Constitution. Congress, therefore, by providing that such an officer should hold his commission for four years, removed the officer from the power of removal of the President, as they could have taken from him the power to appoint. Nobody doubts that if they were inferior officers, as they were, Congress might have given the power to appoint those officers to the people of the district by election, or to any individual that they might think proper, or to any tribunal other than the executive department of the Government. They had a right, although they thought proper to give it to the President himself, to provide that it should endure for four years as against any such power of removal. That is all the case decided upon that question.

My friend supposes that Mr. Justice McLean, in the case in 17 Howard of the United States vs. Guthrie, to which he referred us, held a different doctrine. That also is an error into which the gentleman has fallen. The then Attorney General of the United States maintained that what was done in that case was properly done, because the President had the authority to remove a judge of a Territory, and having removed the judge the salary attached to the office failed as a matter of course as far as he was concerned. The court in deciding it, however, say that that question is not before them, and it is not necessary therefore to decide it. The question before them was whether they could, in the case of a writ of mandamus which might be applied for by an officer to get his salary, enter into the Treasury by judicial process and command the officers of the Treasury to pay the amount claimed. They said not, because that would be to administer the Treasury Department. If the Supreme Court had that authority any other court of the United States had it; and it would be therefore to open the doors of the Treasury to every man who fancied that he was entitled to be paid money by the Government. It would be to convert the judges of the several courts into Secretaries of the Treasury.

Now, what said Mr. Chief Justice McLean? What had been done in that case was done by Mr. Fillmore, and it is a striking case to show how universal was the opinion that the authority to remove was in the President. The case then before the court was the case of the removal of a territorial judge. Mr. Justice McLean thought—and I cannot add to the authority of his name by saying that in my judgment he thought correctly—that however true it was, for he does not deny that it is a settled question that the President has the power to remove, a judicial officer is not within this power.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. JOHNSON. With pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it is proper that I should say that I did not cite that case to show that the court there decided that the President had no power of removal, or for any such purpose; but I produced the statement of Justice McLean to the effect that the Supreme Court of the United States, with Chief Justice Marshall at its head, and of which Justice McLean was a member, did entertain the opinion that the President had no such power. In the absence of any decision of the Supreme Court upon that question, I consider the statement of Justice McLean as the next best authority as to the views of the Supreme Court with regard to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. My friend did not read the whole of that dissenting opinion or he would never have come so positively to that conclusion. Mr. Justice McLean said—and it is better that I should read his very words, and it will be seen that he admits the power of removal, instead of contesting it:

"It was supposed that the exercise of this power by the President was necessary for the efficient discharge of executive duties. That to consult the Senate in making removals, the same as in making appointments, would be too tardy for the correction of abuses. By a temporary appointment the public service is now provided for in case of death, and the same provision could be made where immediate removals are necessary."—17 Howard, p. 306.

"Immediate removals" of whom? There was nobody but the President authorized to remove such officers as are spoken of by the learned justice. He admits, therefore, so far from contesting, that the exigencies of the Government may require an immediate removal; and as there existed no power to make a removal known to the laws in relation to the officers of which he was speaking except the President, he admits that the President has the power in certain cases to make an immediate removal. But that is not all; he goes on upon the next page, which my friend did not read, to say:

"If the power to remove from office be inferred from the power to appoint, both the elements of the appointing power are necessarily included. The Constitution has declared what shall be the executive power to appoint, and by consequence the same power should be exercised in a removal."—Ibid., p. 307.

In other words, he agreed with those who denied the power in the beginning; but what does he say is the law now? Something must be settled; the age cannot go on without having some principles established; no Government can last which has one constitution to-day and another constitution to-morrow. Contemporary construction, acquiesced in by the people, recognized by the courts, adopted by the Executive, in relation to any particular subject, must be the law. Now, what does he say, looking to the effect of what had been the practice of the Government?

"But this power of removal has been perhaps too long established and exercised to be now questioned. The voluntary action of the Senate and the President would be necessary to change the practice; and as this would require the relinquishment of a power by one of the parties to be exercised in conjunction with the other, it can scarcely be expected."—Ibid., p. 307.

So that Mr. Justice McLean considered it settled that the absolute power of removal was in the President, according to the settled practice of the Government under the Constitution. On the same point I take occasion also to refer to the case of ex parte Hennen, 13 Peters, 250. Mr. Justice Thompson, delivering the opinion of the court in that case, said:

"This power of removal from office was a subject much disputed, and upon which a great diversity of opinion was entertained in the early history of this Government. This related, however, to the power of the President to remove officers appointed with the concurrence of the Senate; and the great question was, whether the removal was to be by the President alone, or with the concurrence of the Senate, both constituting the appointing power. No one denied the power of the President and Senate jointly to remove, where the tenure of the office was not fixed by the Constitution: which was a full recognition of the principle that the power of removal was incident to the power of appointment. But it was very early adopted as the practical construction of the Constitution that this power was vested in the President alone."—13 Peters, p. 259.

Mr. President, I have but a few words more to say, and they will be addressed particularly to a vindication of Mr. Madison, not in respect to the opinion which he maintained that the Executive had the power to remove, but as to the effect and meaning of the resolutions of 1798. I will not trouble the Senate by reading them. When the doctrine of nullification was started by Mr. Calhoun and maintained by a plausible course of reasoning which deceived, as I think, the unthinking, and certainly carried along with him the judgment nearly of his whole State, the Legislature of South Carolina, and the politicians of the South generally maintained that that doctrine of nullification or secession was found incorporated in the Kentucky resolutions of 1799 and the Virginia resolutions of 1798. Mr. Madison then wrote several letters to his relative, Mr. Cabell, of Richmond; he wrote to Mr. Webster after Mr. Webster pronounced his celebrated speech upon the Foot resolutions; he wrote to Mr. Everett; and the work which I have before me contains all of the letters to which I have adverted upon that subject, in which he denies positively that the resolutions of 1798, which he admits were drawn by him, and the celebrated report in support of those resolutions, which also was drawn by him, gave the slightest color in his view to the doctrine either of nullification or secession. I have not time to read the letters, nor is it necessary for my purpose. By a course of reasoning that I think must carry conviction to the judgment of all who are not past conviction, he demonstrates that either doctrine is utterly inconsistent with the continuance of the Government, and being so inconsistent, can have no foundation in the Constitution of the United States; and he tells us what he meant by those resolutions of his and the report; and not only that, but the Kentucky resolutions, which were drafted by Mr. Jefferson, he tells his correspondent, Mr. Cabell, were never intended by that statesman to imply any such doctrine.

At that time Mr. Jefferson had left this land of his love and of his hope. Before he died he thought that he saw in the temper of the public mind—it is immaterial to inquire whether he supposed the danger was in the South or in the North, or in the general prevailing temper of the country—danger to the continuance of our institutions; but as Mr. Madison tells us, who knew Mr. Jefferson's thoughts, who had served as his Secretary of State for eight years, who was his constant correspondent after he himself became President of the United States, and when he retired continued to be his correspondent, Mr. Jefferson never contemplated as constitutional the doctrine either of nullification or of secession. I am glad, therefore, to be able, with what I think consists with the truth of history, to vindicate the memory of each of these great men from the assertion that they were guilty of an error which would have rendered, and if it was recognized as a truth would render the continuance of our institutions as temporary as the shadows.

A word more, and I shall cease to trouble the Senate. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] was supposed by some of the Senators to threaten another revolution if this bill or bills of a like character were passed. He disavows any such purpose; and those who know his frankness will have no hesitation in believing in the sincerity of that disavowal. I do not anticipate and do not fear any such revolution as that; but there may be a revolution of a different kind, the kind of revolution which changed the whole political destiny of the country for a time, and which was successfully brought about in 1800. The Congress of the United States, acting with the assent of the then President, Mr. Adams, because he approved of the bills, had passed the alien and sedition laws. The country became alarmed. No force was threatened of a physical kind; but the subjects of the alleged usurpation of power by Congress became matters of political speculation and discussion in the papers of the day. The people of the country came to the rescue of the Constitution thus, in their opinion, invaded, and swept from power those who had adopted such measures. I am no prophet, Mr. President. I may not live to see the day when it shall occur, if it occurs at all, when the same revolution will be seen condemning many of the measures of the present day precisely upon the same ground that the people in 1800 censured and condemned what had been done at that time. A latitudinarian construction of the Constitution, the absorption of nearly all power into the legislative department of the Government, an unwillingness to submit to the judiciary, an interference with what have heretofore been considered the legitimate powers of the President—I do not say from any bad motive—these are the symptoms of the times.

We have just emerged from a war without example in the annals of civil strife or any other strife. Every house in our broad land is filled more or less with mourning for the departed dead who, upon one side or the other, have died in support of what they believed to be the principles of liberty. The angry passions have been excited. They more or less affect us all, for members of Congress are but men. They lead to a claim for power that would not have been thought of in the beginning of the Government. When everything becomes quiet and settled; when the particular circumstances to which the party who are now dominant owe their present condition shall cease to exist; when they shall have a President of their own choice, (if that is to be the result of the present state of things,) who will carry out what they believe to be the true policy of the country, reason then, with them and with the Opposition, (if it does not control us now,) will control, and a better day will dawn upon a now distracted land. But, sir, that is not to be done through the instrumentality of a civil war. Its desolation; the affliction with which it has visited individual men and women; the loss of material wealth; the danger to which our very Government was subjected during its existence, and must be more or less subjected during any such strife—all are warnings to keep us again from entering into any such conflict. The conflict into which alone the people will enter will be that which the ballot will decide, for which that weapon alone will be used; and when, as I believe in my existence, the time shall come when the excitement of the day shall have terminated and the judgment of the people shall be what it was from the beginning of the Government up to the commencement of this strife, the Constitution will be restored in all its integrity and each department of the Government be permitted to exercise every power which the Constitution as construed in the past vests with it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I listened yesterday with very much of interest and attention to the remarks of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] in support of the bill before the Senate; but I listened in vain for a statement by him, distinctly and clearly made, of the ground of power upon which this bill was reported and its passage proposed. I understood him, however, at one stage of his argument to take the ground which was originally taken when this question was discussed in the Congress of 1789 by most of those who then opposed the construction given to the Constitution upon this subject, to wit: that the power of removing from office in our Government arose by implication from the provision which confers upon the President the power of appointment, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." If this bill be pressed upon that ground, upon the ground that there is an implied power in the President and the Senate to remove from office because they are joined together for the purpose of appointment, it will inevitably follow that this bill will stand condemned; it cannot be justified upon the ground which is stated in its support.

Mr. President, there are but two possible locations in this Government for the power of removal under the Constitution of the United States; and I say this in view of former discussions and in view of the expressed opinions of leading men at different periods of our history, both those who have been concerned in the enactment and execution of the laws and those who have written expositions of the Constitution as scholars in the retiracy of their closets.

If this power to remove be one conferred by the Constitution, it must be vested in the President of the United States alone, who is the head of the executive department and charged with the execution of the laws, or it must be vested in the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate upon the ground of implication which I have already mentioned. If the power be not vested in the President alone or in the President and the Senate, it is located nowhere; it exists nowhere; and the argument in favor of the enactment of a law proposing to vest it anywhere must be upon the ground that it is an ideal or latent power which may be created or called into active existence by virtue of those general powers of legislation which are vested in the Congress of the United States. But inasmuch as this is a Government of granted and vested powers, and inasmuch as the grants to Congress are specific, upon the very statement of the point itself the conclusion must be against it. We must reject the argument and recur back to the alternative before mentioned. Before I am done I will read authorities upon these several points by which my statement of them will be fully vindicated.

I say, then, that the Senator from Oregon, in his argument in favor of this bill, was not satisfactory in his statement of the ground of power upon which he claimed that we could enact it. Taking for granted that he stands upon the ground that this is a power arising by implication and by virtue of the Constitution vested in the President and in the Senate, how stands his bill? Why, sir, upon that implication this power must be exclusive in the President and in the Senate; neither can divest themselves of it; nor can the law-making power charge its exercise upon one to the exclusion of the other. And yet what does this bill do? You propose by law to provide that the President shall suspend from office—an exercise of the power of removal to a certain extent, and standing upon the same grounds of argument as the absolute and complete power of removal itself. If your argument be sound, you cannot by law provide that the President shall suspend, that he shall make a partial removal from office, without the advice and consent of the Senate before the suspension is made or ordered.

Equally clear is it upon the very face of this bill that the main, the important exception which is made, and properly and necessarily made from it, is in this view unconstitutional, to wit, the exception of the several heads of Departments from the operation of this proposed law. If the President and Senate are by the Constitution united for the purpose of removal as well as appointment, it will follow that you cannot, as you propose by this bill, permit the President alone to remove the heads of the executive Departments—the principal officers who are associated with him in the execution of the laws.

Your bill, then, stands condemned upon this ground, which is the only ground in my opinion that can be with any plausibility urged in its support. The premises from which you proceed will not justify the conclusion at which you arrive.

The bill before us gives to Senators the same participation in removals from office that they possess under the Constitution in cases of appointment. Their "advice and consent" is necessary by the express terms of the Constitution to the appointment of "ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court," and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not otherwise provided for in the Constitution, and which may be "established by law." The question now is whether their "advice and consent" is necessary under the Constitution to the removal of such officers, or whether a requirement of such advice and consent to removals may be established by law. The question is one of the first magnitude among all those which can arise in the practical action of the Government, and deserves debate which shall rise above the passions and selfish interests of the hour.

The proposition which has been heretofore maintained by all the great departments of the Government, that is, by Congress, by the President, and by the Supreme Court, has been that all removals from office (except of "inferior officers" whose appointments are vested by law "in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments") are to be made by the President without any senatorial advice or consent. He is to act alone without check or limitation upon his power or division of his responsibility. And this has been held to be a constitutional principle, secure from molestation by statute.

The President's power of removal was well considered in the First Congress which assembled under the Constitution, and fortunately the debate as well as the decision then made has been preserved to us. There is no express provision in the Constitution on the subject of removals from office, except one under the head of impeachment, which is to be found in the third section of the first article. The power, therefore, if it exist at all, except in the Senate when sitting as a court of impeachment, must be an implied one, and manifestly it must be vested in the President of the United States or in the President and Senate.

That this power is vested in the President alone by the Constitution ought not now to be questioned in view of the past practice of the Government, and of the decisions which have been made by its several departments. But as this bill does question that location of the power, and brings up again the objections which were urged on former occasions against such location, we are obliged once more to traverse the field of debate upon the general subject, and to repel again those arguments which were formerly advanced in favor of senatorial participation in removals.

The most favorable occasion which has ever presented itself for considering and deciding this subject was presented in the Congress of 1789; for the Government was then about to be put in operation. Its organization was just begun. Most of the offices under it were unfilled. There were no private interests to be effected by a construction of the Constitution upon the question of removals from office. Political parties, as they afterward took form, were unknown. General Washington was President, and many leading men who had participated in the forming of the Constitution and in its adoption by the several States were members in both Houses of Congress. This point was put with great propriety and force by one of the members who participated in the debate in the House of Representatives, and who had been prominent in the constitutional convention; I mean Mr. Madison. He said:

"In another point of view it is proper that this interpretation should now take place rather than at a time when the exigency of the case may require the exercise of the power of removal. At present the disposition of every gentleman is to seek the truth and abide by its guidance when it is discovered. I have reason to believe the same disposition prevails in the Senate. But will this be the case when some individual officer of high rank draws into question the capacity of the President, with the Senate, to effect his removal? If we leave the Constitution to take this course it can never be expounded until the President shall think it expedient to exercise the right of removal, if he supposes he has it; then the Senate may be induced to set up their pretensions. And will they decide so calmly as at this time, when no important officer in any of the great departments is appointed to influence their judgments? The imagination of no member here or of the Senate or of the President himself is heated or disturbed by faction. If ever a proper moment for decision should offer, it must be one like the present."—Annals of Congress, vol. i, p. 547.

These words of wisdom deserve as much consideration now as they did when uttered, exhibiting as they do in contrast the superior competency and fitness of the Congress of 1789, before parties were formed and personal interests in the tenure of offices had come into existence, over the present Congress filled with heated partisans and subject to the influence of thousands of officers deeply interested in the subject of our debates.

The question was decided after full discussion in both Houses in favor of the presidential power of removal under the Constitution, and this decision was indorsed by the signature of President Washington to the bill in which it was contained. And that decision stands unreversed to this day during a period of seventy-seven years. No more authoritative decision upon a constitutional question, open to debate, appears anywhere in our political history, nor one in which there has been more uniform and complete acquiescence by all departments of the Government. Even those public men and jurists who have sometimes suggested their doubts of the propriety or correctness of the decision have acquiesced in its binding force and asserted the impropriety of attempting to disturb it.

It is true that the "pretensions" of the Senate to participate in removals, spoken of by Mr. Madison in the extract just read, were faintly pressed, although not persisted in in the senatorial debates of 1834. At that time Mr. Madison was yet living and gave once more an emphatic expression of his opinion. In a letter to John M. Patton, dated March 24, 1834, he said:

"Should the controversy on removals from office end in the establishment of a share in the power, as claimed for the Senate, it would materially vary the relations among the component parts of the Government, and disturb the operation of the checks and balances now understood to exist. If the right of the Senate be, or be made, a constitutional one, it will enable that branch of the Government to force on the executive department a continuance in office even of the Cabinet officers, notwithstanding a change from a personal and political harmony with the President, to a state of open hostility toward him. If the right of the Senate be made to depend on the Legislature, it would still be grantable in that extent; and even with the exceptions of the heads of Departments and a few other officers, the augmentation of the senatorial patronage, and the new relation between the Senate directly and the Legislature indirectly, with the Chief Magistrate, would be felt deeply in the general administration of the Government. The innovation, however modified, would more than double the danger of throwing the executive machinery out of gear, and thus arresting the march of the Government altogether."

"The Constitution of the United States may doubtless disclose, from time to time, faults which call for the pruning or the ingrafting hand. But remedies ought to be applied, not in the paroxysms of party and popular excitements, but with the more leisure and reflection as the great departments of power according to experience may be successively and alternately in and out of public favor; and as changes hastily accommodated to these vicissitudes would destroy the symmetry and the stability aimed at in our political system."

In a letter to Edward Coles, dated Montpelier, August 29, 1834, he said:

"For claims are made by the Senate in opposition to the principles and practice of every Administration, my own included, and varying materially, in some instances, the relations between the great departments of the Government."

In a subsequent letter to the same person, dated October 15, 1834, he said:

"You are at a loss for the innovating doctrines of the Senate to which I alluded. Permit me to specify the following:

"The claim on constitutional ground to a share in the removal as well as appointment of officers is in direct opposition to the uniform practice of the Government from its commencement. It is clear that the innovation would not only vary essentially the existing balance of power, but expose the Executive occasionally to a total inaction, and at all times to delays fatal to the due execution of the laws."

Lastly, on this point I quote from his letter to Charles Francis Adams, dated October 13, 1835, being one of the very last letters written by him, in which he said:

"The claims for the Senate of a share in the removal from office, and for the Legislature an authority to regulate its tenure, have had powerful advocates. I must still think, however, that the text of the Constitution is best interpreted by reference to the tripartite theory of government to which practice has conformed, and which so long and uniform a practice would seem to have established."

"The face of the Constitution and the journalized proceedings of the Convention strongly indicate a partiality to that theory, then at its zenith of favor among the most distinguished commentators on the organizations of political power."

"The right of suffrage, the rule of apportioning representation, and the mode of appointing to and removing from office are fundamentals in a free Government and ought to be fixed by the Constitution. If alterable by the Legislature the Government might become the creator of the Constitution of which it is itself but the creature; and if the large States could be reconciled to an augmentation of power in the Senate, constructed and endowed as that branch of the Government is, a veto on removals from office would at all times be worse than inconvenient in its operation, and in party times might, by throwing the executive machinery out of gear, produce a calamitous interregnum."

"In making these remarks I am not unaware that in a country wide and expanding as ours is, and in the anxiety to convey information to the door of every citizen, an unforeseen multiplication of officers may add a weight to the executive scale, disturbing the equilibrium of the Government. I should, therefore, see with pleasure a guard against the evil by whatever regulations having that effect may be within the scope of legislative power; or, if necessary, even by an amendment to the Constitution, when a lucid interval of party excitement shall invite the experiment."

But it was not formally proposed in 1834 that the concurrence of the Senate in removals should be required, although a proposition to that effect was mentioned. The debate was mainly upon a proposition that in case of removals from office by the President he should report his reasons to the Senate. The power in his hands was to be left undisturbed, entire and without limitation. But the question was never pressed to a vote, although the Senate was politically opposed to the President, and much feeling existed with the majority regarding removals which had been made.

That the power of appointment is with the President will appear from considering particular clauses of the Constitution. The second article declares "that the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States." By the second section "he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, all officers of the United States" except such "inferior officers" as Congress may think proper to be appointed "by the President alone, by the courts of law, and by the heads of Departments." Further, "he shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session." By the third section of the same article, it is provided, that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed and shall commission all officers of the United States."

Thus it appears that the general mass of executive powers is vested in the President, including the power of appointment to office and the commissioning of offices appointed, and he is charged with the duty of taking care that the laws be duly executed, which has particular reference, as I understand the injunction, to his control or influence over the officers of his department or branch of the Government. And although laws may be enacted for the appointment of certain inferior officers by the heads of Departments, his control or influence is preserved, as to them, by his selection of the heads of Departments who appoint them. For particular reasons, however, not affecting the general argument, certain officials may be selected or appointed by the legislative and judicial departments. Each House of Congress may select their own officers necessary to the transaction of their business, and the officers so selected are not considered to be "officers of the United States" within the language of the Constitution, but simply officers of each House. So subordinate officers of the courts may by law be made appointable by the courts in which they serve, and the President will have but a slight or remote influence over them. For although he appoints the judges, the judicial tenure is during good behavior and the judges cannot be removed by him. Excepting, however, these two classes of subordinate officers in other departments of the Government beside his own, his power of appointment extends directly or indirectly to every officer of the United States at home and abroad. It is a great and extensive power and is appropriately placed in his hands as the executive head of the Government.

But this power is subjected to an important check in that provision of the Constitution which requires the advice and consent of the Senate to all appointments except the subordinate ones before mentioned. He must in all other cases obtain senatorial assent before appointing and commissioning an officer, unless in case of vacancy during a recess of the Senate. I do not understand the act of the Senate in advising and consenting to a nomination to be in any sense an act of appointment. It is simply a permission and recommendation that the appointment shall be made, and the actual appointment and the issuing of a commission to the person appointed, acts executive in their nature, are performed by the President alone. The advice and consent of the Senate does not compel him to make an appointment. It is simply a prerequisite to his exercise of the power and no part of the power itself.

Such appearing to be, upon examination, an exact and just description of the nature and effects of senatorial advice and consent in cases of proposed appointment to office, we are prepared to go on to the main question involved in this debate, which is the question of removals.

It must be manifest to every man of reflection that in any constitution of government there must be provision made for dismissing criminal and incompetent persons from the public service. For without this power it would be impossible to preserve the Government from corruption and imbecility. Our ancestors were not so foolish as to overlook this great necessity, this indispensable requisite, for rendering their work complete. Having established the great departments of the Government, they conferred upon each all the powers necessary to its successful action. The question with which we are now concerned is, what provision did they make for removals from office—for relieving the public service, when necessary, from incompetent and vicious men? The answer to this question is given in part by the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, which provides that—

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office upon impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

By the third section of the first article the Senate has the sole power to try all impeachments, which are to be preferred before it by the House of Representatives, and in case of conviction the judgment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. The members of the Senate are to sit under oath, and a two-thirds vote is required for a judgment of condemnation. This remedy for official misconduct is certainly extensive in including all civil officers of the United States, but it can be invoked only in case of criminal conduct of a high order of enormity, and is utterly inadequate to the ordinary demands of the public service. As to Senators and Representatives in Congress, who are not liable to impeachment, they can be removed from their offices by two-thirds votes of the respective Houses to which they belong. Military and naval officers are also excluded from the impeachment power for reasons which need not now be investigated.

Manifestly also the Congress of the United States, by virtue of its general legislative powers, may in certain cases prescribe the punishment of removal from office and disqualifications for holding office, in case of conviction of crime in the courts of the United States. But none of these remedies, important as they are, and necessary to the working of our constitutional system, are sufficient as a check to official delinquency. They are inadequate to secure integrity and efficiency in the administration of the Government, to guard against the innumerable abuses of official life and conduct, and to retain to republican institutions that degree of excellence which is necessary to their popularity and perpetuity. And hence the contestation has commonly been made that a power of summary removal from office in addition to those already mentioned must exist somewhere in the Government, and the debate has been not so much upon the existence of the power as upon its particular location. Is it vested in the President, or in the President and Senate, or is it a floating, unlocated, or latent power, which may be defined and located or called into existence by statute law? These are the questions to which we may turn our attention, to which all further debate may be confined.

A strong objection to "advice and consent" by the Senate to removals from office is the incompatibility of such function with the senatorial powers of trying "all impeachments of civil officers of the United States." When acting upon an impeachment the Senate sits as a court and its members are under oath; and the judgment it renders is a judicial judgment, imposing punishment upon the accused if guilty, and completely discharging him from the accusation if innocent. Now, the most indispensable requisite upon the trial of an impeachment is, that the Senate shall be impartial between the Government and the accused; in fact, impartiality is indispensable above every other qualification to a judicial tribunal, and the utmost care is to be exercised in constituting such tribunals in order to secure it.

But if the Senate is to participate in removals from office, if it is to be consulted and its judgment taken in cases of proposed removals, it is manifest that it cannot be an impartial court for the trial of impeachments. Its character as an impartial tribunal for judicial purposes will be destroyed.

In exercising a power or function of advice and consent in questions of removal two classes of cases will arise: first, those where the Senate will advise and consent to a removal; and second, those where their assent will be refused. Let us examine each of these classes in the order mentioned. First, where the Senate upon investigating complaints against a public officer shall be of opinion that the charges are sustained and shall thereupon advise and consent to his removal, the President still may not remove the officer. The preliminary consent of the Senate will not compel, but only permit him to remove. He may change his opinion either upon new evidence presented to him or by reason of fuller reflection upon the case, or, pending the proceeding, a new President may come into office who may disagree in opinion with his predecessor. If for any cause the officer shall not be removed by the President, the House of Representatives may impeach the officer and bring him to the bar of the Senate for trial. But the Senate has already disqualified itself from trying the case as an impartial tribunal. It has already formed and expressed its opinion in the prior proceeding, and it would be an outrage upon justice for it to assume and exercise its duties as a court.

Take another case, a case where a removal is actually made by the President after senatorial advice and consent. The officer is removed from his office, and nothing more. But this punishment for transgression is very different from that which might be adjudged to him upon impeachment. Upon impeachment in a proper case the sentence would include a disqualification for holding office in the future under the United States. So it appears that in acting upon an impeachment of an officer preferred before it, the Senate would impose one form of punishment, while in acting with the President upon the same question of misconduct it would advise and consent to a smaller punishment; to one into which no disqualification for holding office would enter. We need not here determine the question whether an officer thus removed by the President, with senatorial consent, would still be liable to impeachment by the House of Representatives; for whether liable or not the participation of the Senate in his removal stands equally condemned. If no proceeding of impeachment can be instituted against an officer when out of office for a crime or misdemeanor committed by him when in office, it follows that the right of the House to have a judgment of disqualification pronounced upon him is evaded and defeated. If, on the other hand, the House can still prefer articles of impeachment against him and bring him before the Senate for trial, you have again the difficulty of a tribunal already committed in opinion and judgment upon the guilt of the accused, and thereby disqualified for giving him an impartial trial.

Take another case from the second class of cases, according to the division already mentioned—a case of the refusal of consent by the Senate to a removal. The officer remains in office; the President cannot remove him because the Senate has formed and expressed its opinion in his favor upon all the grounds of charge against him. But the right of the House to prefer articles of impeachment and to demand his removal, if they are sustained by proof, must remain unaffected and in full force. But, as in the former case, the Senate has disqualified itself for entering upon the trial. Its impartiality is gone from it; it is already committed against the prosecution; and its pride, self-respect, and regard for consistency, its feelings, passions, and opinions, all fix it as a partisan of the accused, and commit it to his vindication and support against the impeachment of the House. Under such circumstances a proceeding by the House to bring an offender to justice would be vain, fruitless, absurd.

As regards all cases of this description, the impeachment power might as well as not be struck from the Constitution, for its operation, its vitality is destroyed. It may be said that the Senate, upon a full trial, might change its opinion, might obtain and act upon new views regarding the official conduct of the officer accused. This is not a reasonable supposition; it is opposed to the teachings of experience and to human nature itself. Besides, it is to be remembered that a two-thirds vote is necessary to a judgment of condemnation upon impeachment, whereas a majority merely may advise and consent or refuse their advice and consent to a removal from office by the President. If therefore a majority have refused their consent to a presidential removal and become committed in favor of the officer accused, it is hardly within the bounds of possibility that two thirds should afterward condemn the same officer upon a proceeding of impeachment.

In whatever light, then, you view the alleged power of the Senate to advise and consent to removals from office, it appears utterly inconsistent with its unquestioned power and duty to try all impeachments of "civil officers of the United States." The conclusion is inevitable that the authors of the Constitution, who conferred upon the Senate in express terms the power to try all impeachments, did not intend them or empower them to act in any way whatever in conjunction with the President or as advisers of the President in questions of removal from office; and it is equally clear that so long as the Senate shall be the constitutional tribunal for the trial of impeachments it ought not to be authorized to act upon questions of removal, either to investigate them or to give advice upon them.

This argument, then, founded upon the impeachment clauses of the Constitution, is decisive upon both points of the present inquiry; it is decisive against the existence of this alleged power in the Senate, and also against the policy, the propriety, I had almost said the possibility, of vesting it in the Senate by constitutional amendment or (if that were possible) by statute law.

And this argument might be extended and strengthened by observations upon the impeachability of the President himself and the impropriety of involving him in warm controversies before the very body which may be required to sit in judgment as a court upon his official conduct.

But not only is there no advisory power in cases of removal vested in the Senate by the Constitution, but there could have been no reason for so vesting such power. The Constitution of the Senate does not adapt it to the performance of such duty, and the argument against it, upon this ground, becomes stronger every year. It might have been possible in the earlier years of the Government that the Senate should investigate questions of removal and determine them; for offices were few in number and the cases of removal were rare. Now, however, when offices have multiplied enormously; when they are counted by thousands in each great branch of the public service, civil, military, and naval, and when removals must be frequent and promptly made, it is impossible that the Senate should exercise the advisory power in question intelligently and justly, with convenience to itself or advantage to the public. As much of time is now bestowed by it upon questions of appointment as can be spared from the performance of legislative duties. But in the execution of the duty now charged upon it, it acts summarily, and not with prolonged or thorough deliberation. The evidence before it is partial and inexact; witnesses are rarely examined; papers are rarely verified by certificates or oath, and parties nominated are either unheard or heard irregularly and imperfectly. Only such information is sought or received as will enable members to form a general, unstudied opinion upon the qualifications and character of nominees. And this is supposed to be sufficient for the due performance of the duty charged upon the Senate. The actual appointment, after all, is made by the President, and he is mainly responsible to the country for the selection made.

It is found, I repeat, that the executive duties of the Senate upon appointments, although discharged in the manner described, are a serious tax upon the time and attention of the members, and interfere to some extent with the performance by them of other duties.

How would the case stand if they were required to advise and consent to removals from office? In the first place, the charges against an officer, or the causes alleged for his removal, would be laid before them in specific form. This would be necessary to their investigation of the case. Next, they would be compelled to receive evidence in some form or manner, both for and against the officer accused or sought to be removed; and as it would be monstrous to condemn him unheard, rules for notice to him and for hearing him would have to be fixed. And as it would be impossible for the Senate in executive session to conduct an examination, that duty would have to be charged upon committees, and those committees armed with adequate powers for the purpose. Then would follow examinations of witnesses before committee, or the taking of their depositions in some regular manner upon commission or rule. Possibly counsel might be introduced, or the parties themselves be heard. In any case, the decision and report of a committee on a case must be subject to review and debate by the Senate, with a consumption of time, and possibly with an exasperation of debate of which members can now form no conception. A code of rules for the management of this new business must grow up or be established, and the investigations made must assume a judicial character. If justice is to be attained, if private right is to be respected, if sound or safe conclusions are to be reached, both the Senate and its committees must act through judicial forms; at least through such as are everywhere held necessary to the ascertainment of truth. The accusation and the defense must be both heard; the evidence must be taken under oath and before competent authority, and upon reasonable notice; and opportunity must be afforded for argument and for deliberation and debate.

Let no one tell me that these speculations are extravagant or chimerical because we do not encounter intolerable difficulty or inconvenience in acting upon questions of appointment. For the reasons already stated, and for many others which might be mentioned, questions of removal are widely different from those of appointment, and they will involve senatorial duties of a different description and more arduous character—duties to which the Senate is unsuited by its very constitution as well as by the pressure of other duties upon it.

It is said that this bill may be a valuable check upon political removals from office, upon proscription for opinion's sake by the executive Department. Well, sir, it is manifest that it will not be so when the President of the United States and the majority of the Senate agree together in their political opinions. Because the responsibility of removals will then be divided between two departments of the Government instead of being charged upon one, it is more likely that proscription will be increased, that instead of the volume of proscriptive action in the Government being abated and reduced, it will be enlarged and swollen. The division of responsibility between the two departments will induce more extravagant and extensive action in purging all departments of the public service from political opponents. Nay, sir, the political majority in the Senate itself will be apt to urge forward the President in the business of proposing to them the removal of officers of the United States subject to their joint power. This will be the case, one half the whole time or more, at all times when the President and the majority of the Senate shall agree in political sentiment and shall be inspired by common political passions and purposes leading to concert of conduct.

Again, when the President and the majority of the Senate shall disagree, which is the only other possible case, we shall incur the danger that the Senate, for political reasons, will keep in office persons who ought to be removed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to ask my friend is that danger any greater in the nature of the thing than that the President for political reasons should do precisely the opposite?

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is, because at present the President may retain an improper officer in office, or, to speak to the precise point, he may retain him in office for political reasons when he ought to be removed. That is an existing inconvenience of our system. Now, what is the remedy proposed? Not that the President may not hereafter keep him in office in such a case; but that, besides that inconvenience and evil, there shall be another inconvenience and evil added to it, to wit: that the Senate shall act in the same way and for the same reason, and that instead of having a single inconvenience in the Government with regard to keeping improper officers in office for political reasons you shall have it doubled; there shall be two interests distinct, independent from each other, acting in this direction, instead of one. That will be the state of the case when the President and the majority of the Senate disagree in political sentiment, the alternative to the other case which I mentioned, the case when they will be agreed.

Again, sir, by this proposed system of senatorial advice and consent to removals, the President is put in the attitude of a public prosecutor before the Senate against officers of the United States whose removal may be desired by him. He is put in the position of a prosecutor to be sustained by his political friends in the Senate when they are in a majority, and to be voted down by his political opponents when they are in a majority. He is to be strengthened and encouraged in the work of proscription at one time by his political friends in the Senate, and to be deterred from, or frustrated in, the performance of his duty at another time by his political enemies here. It must be admitted, then, that the value of this bill as a check upon political removals has been overstated and misconceived; and if the balance be struck between the good and evil to be expected from it in regard to political removals alone, it is not at all certain that the former will be in excess.

But let us examine this senatorial "pretension" upon other grounds of expediency and policy.

In the first place, it transfers power over removals to a body of men who are less responsible than the President, both to the people and to the law. The President (notwithstanding the formalities of electors and electoral colleges) is, in fact, chosen and appointed to his high office by a popular vote taken throughout the States of the Union, and must return his trust to the people at the end of four years, to be renewed to him or the renewal withheld according to their sovereign pleasure. But the members of the Senate are chosen by the State Legislatures, and for six-year terms. One third only of its members go out biennially, and in its constitution and character it is a perpetual body. It is therefore less responsible than the President to the people. But it is also less responsible to the law, because its members cannot be impeached. It was determined in the case of Senator Blount that the House of Representatives cannot prefer articles of impeachment against a member of the Senate, and that is now an established doctrine or rule of constitutional law.

But if the Senate is to be considered a popular body, though removed in the second degree from the people, it is such upon a principle of gross inequality. Three million of population east of the Hudson have twelve representatives in the Senate, while seven millions in Pennsylvania and New York have but four. And new States and small States in other sections of the Union have power here grossly disproportioned to the populations they contain.

Upon this point of State representation in the Senate I say let the Constitution stand as it is, at least let it stand until it shall be regularly amended. As a legislative body, the Senate stands intrenched in the Constitution. But it is now proposed to extend to it (and in part by its own vote) executive powers of the most extensive and dangerous character, never heretofore assumed or exercised by it during the seventy-seven years since the Government was organized. Will its comparatively irresponsible domination over all official patronage and all executive action be satisfactory to the people? Is it expedient by this measure to invite keen scrutiny into its character and conduct, and generally into its claims to the possession of additional, delicate, and dangerous powers?

In the next place, what effect will be produced upon the Senate itself by the possession and exercise of this new power? Are the officers of the United States to be the clients of members of the Senate, as persons accused at one stage of Roman history were clients of the Senators; their retainers? What effect is to be produced upon the popular politics of the country, upon the selection of members of this body in the different State Legislatures; ay, sir, upon the purity of this body itself, when it comes to be connected, and connected intimately, with the innumerable questions concerning the retention of officers in all parts of the United States; when power is lodged here with individual members to hold men in their offices, or to instigate and assent to their removal by the President? I beg gentlemen to consider what effect is to be produced upon the character of the Senate itself by this new, portentous, unexampled jurisdiction upon which the Senate has never heretofore ventured to enter. The Senate has never set up this pretension, at least in any form of practical action, from the time when it was first denounced and branded by the father of the Constitution in the debate of 1789.

Again, consider, sir, the effect of this executive power lodged in the Senate in another point of view. It will give to this branch of the Government domination over the executive department to an extent never contemplated heretofore, and of the effects of which we are incompetent to form a distinct opinion. It was well described, perhaps, by one member of the House of Representatives, in the debate to which I have referred, when he said that a provision of this sort—I mean a provision conferring upon the Senate power over removals from office—would establish it as a two-headed monster, with a legislative and an executive head, planted here in the Government, dominating over each of the other two great departments, the President and House, one of which is united with it in the enactment of laws, and the other in their enforcement.

Upon every ground, then, upon which I have examined this measure, it is in my opinion open to insuperable objections. Instead of a measure of reform it is one of degeneracy. Instead of applying in practice a principle of the Constitution it invades that instrument. Instead of introducing purity into the Government it will be the source and parent of corruption and of evil. It treats with contempt the whole past history of this Government and the decision even of Congress itself upon a former occasion. It sets precedent at naught, while on grounds of reason it stands condemned, as I have attempted to show, by the most conclusive and indisputable arguments.

It remains only in the execution of my task to state clearly the grounds of authority against this measure. I have stated those of reason already. The Congress of the United States assembled on the 4th of March, 1789. In the Senate a quorum appeared for the first time on the 1st of April, nearly a month afterward. On the 19th of May, early in the session, in the House of Representatives, in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, Mr. Madison moved—

"That there shall be established an executive department to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs, at the head of which there shall be an officer to be called the Secretary to the Department of Foreign Affairs, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, and to be removable by the President."

On the same day, after protracted debate, Mr. Bland moved to add to the motion the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." The question on adding these words was put and lost. Afterward, on the same day, the question was taken and carried by a considerable majority in favor of declaring the power of removal to be in the President; that is, the motion I have already read was adopted.

In debate at that time, Mr. MADISON said: "On the constitutionality of the declaration of presidential power I have no manner of doubt."

Mr. BENSON, another member who supported it, said:

"This clause would be a mere legislative construction of the Constitution."

Mr. VINTON, another and a leading member of the House—

"Had no doubt but the Constitution gave this power to the President; but if doubt were entertained he thought it prudent to make a legislative declaration of the sentiments of Congress on this point."

There were prolonged debates upon this subject.

"On the 19th of June, on a motion to strike out the words 'to be removable by the President,' the question being taken, the motion was rejected—yeas 20, nays 34."

"On the 22d of June, Mr. BENSON moved to amend by inserting the words 'whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy.' This was carried—yeas 30, nays 18."

"Then, the words 'to be removable by the President,' were, on motion of Mr. BENSON, struck out—yeas 31, nays 19."

These latter motions were made for the purpose of avoiding an argument which had been made against the measure by its opponents, to wit: that by saying in the bill itself that this officer should be removed by the President, it would be inferred that Congress conferred the power upon him, and therefore the phraseology was changed deliberately by the friends of the presidential power, and the bill was made simply to declare that when the President should remove the officer, or in any other case of vacancy, the office should be filled by the chief clerk; so that there should be upon the face of the statute an express recognition by Congress of the President's power of removal under the Constitution. The debate shows that a new form was given to the measure for the express purpose of excluding in all future time and from any quarter any allegation that the President derived his power from the legislation of Congress. That bill finally passed the House on the 24th of June, by a vote of—yeas 29, nays 22.

Now, sir, I propose to read from the debates attending the passage of the measure, the history of which I have traced, certain opinions of prominent men upon the point mentioned by me in the outset of my remarks. I mean the question of the right of the Legislature to confer upon the Senate and President jointly this power of removing from office. That point was suggested, and Mr. Madison replied as follows:

"Several constructions have been put upon the Constitution relative to the point in question. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHERMAN] has advanced a doctrine which was not touched upon before. He seems to think (if I understood him rightly) that the power of displacing from office is subject to legislative discretion; because, it having a right to create, it may limit or modify as it thinks proper. I shall not say but at first view this doctrine may seem to have some plausibility. But when I consider that the Constitution clearly intended to maintain a marked distinction between the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of Government; and when I consider that if the Legislature has a power, such as is contended for, they may subject and transfer at discretion powers from one department of our Government to another; they may on that principle exclude the President altogether from exercising any authority in the removal of officers; they may give it to the Senate alone, or the President and Senate combined; they may vest it in the whole Congress, or they may reserve it to be exercised by this House. When I consider the consequence, of this doctrine and compare them with the true principles of the Constitution, I own that I cannot subscribe to it."—Annals of Congress, vol. 1, p. 496.

Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, one of the most distinguished men of that age, said upon this same subject:

"This has been supposed by some gentlemen to be an omitted case."

That is, this power of removal—

"and that Congress have the power of supplying the defect. Let gentlemen consider the ground on which they tread. If it is an omitted case, an attempt in the Legislature to supply the defect will be in fact an attempt to amend the Constitution. But this can only be done in the way pointed out by the fifth article of that instrument, and an attempt to amend it in any other way may be a high crime or misdemeanor, or perhaps something worse."—Ibid. p. 503.

And he goes on with a further argument in support of the same view. Again, he said, in a subsequent stage of the debate:

"If the Legislature have not the power of removal they cannot confer it upon others; if they have it, it is a legislative power, and they have no right to transfer the exercise of it to any other body. So view this question in whatever point of light you please, it is clear the words ought to be struck out."—Ibid., p. 576.

Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, said:

"It is contended that the Legislature have the power of supplying the defect if this is an omitted case. I cannot be of that opinion. But it is unnecessary to extend this argument after what has been urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GERRY.] If the Legislature can supply defects, they may virtually repeal the Constitution."—Ibid., p. 508.

Mr. White, of Virginia, said:

"Some gentlemen have supposed that the Constitution has made no provision for the removal of officers; and they have called it an omitted case or defect. They ask if we may not supply that defect? I say in general we may not; for if we can assume the right of supplying defects and making alterations, we may go on and make the Constitution just what we please."—Ibid., p. 517.

Finally, I will read the opinion of Mr. Boudinot. He said:

"For my part, I conceive it is impossible to carry into execution the powers of the President in a salutary manner unless he has the power of removal vested in him. I do not mean that if it was not vested in him by the Constitution it would be proper for Congress to confer it; though I do believe the Government would otherwise be very defective, yet we would have to bear this inconvenience until it was rectified by an amendment of the Constitution. For my part, I would adhere to every principle contained in it, however defective, and not infringe it for any purpose whatever."—Ibid., p. 529.

So much for that question. From the same debates I propose to read so much as will show the grounds upon which the majority acted at that time. In the first place I read the opinion of George Clymer, a Representative from Pennsylvania, who said on the 19th of May, 1789:

"The power of removal was an executive power, and as such belonged to the President alone by the express words of the Constitution: 'the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.' The Senate were not an executive body; they were a legislative one. It was true, in some instances, they held a qualified check over the executive power, but that was in consequence of an express declaration in the Constitution: without such declaration they would not have been called upon for advice and consent in the case of appointment. Why, then, shall we extend their power to control the removal which is naturally in the Executive, unless it is likewise expressly declared in the Constitution?"—Ibid., p. 332.

I will conclude these extracts by reading what Mr. Madison said in the debate on the 17th of June, and at other times, in vindication of his own position and in answer to the argument in favor of senatorial power:

"But let us not consider the question on one side only; there are dangers to be contemplated on the other. Vest this power in the Senate jointly with the President, and you abolish at once that great principle of unity and responsibility in the executive department which was intended for the security of liberty and the public good. If the President should possess alone the power of removal from office, those who are employed in the execution of law will be in their proper situation, and the chain of dependence be preserved: the lowest officers, the middle grade, and the highest will depend, as they ought, on the President, and the President on the community. The chain of dependence therefore terminates in the supreme body, namely, in the people, who will possess, besides, in aid of their original power, the decisive engine of impeachment. Take the other supposition; that the power should be vested in the Senate, on the principle that the power to displace is necessarily connected with the power to appoint. It is declared by the Constitution that we may by law vest the appointment of inferior officers in the heads of Departments; the power of removal being incidental as stated by some gentlemen. Where does this terminate? If you begin with the subordinate officers, they are dependent on their superior, he on the next superior, and he on—whom? On the Senate, a permanent body; a body, by its particular mode of election, in reality existing forever; a body possessing that proportion of aristocratic power which the Constitution no doubt thought wise to be established in the system, but which some have strongly excepted against. And let me ask gentlemen, is there equal security in this case as in the other? Shall we trust the Senate, responsible to individual Legislatures, rather than the person who is responsible to the whole community? It is true the Senate do not hold their offices for life, like aristocracies recorded in the historic page; yet the fact is, they will not possess that responsibility for the exercise of executive powers which would render it safe for us to vest such powers in them. But what an aspect will this give to the Executive? Instead of keeping the departments of Government distinct, you make an executive out of one branch of the Legislature; you make the Executive a two-headed monster, to use the expression of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. Livermore,] you destroy the great principle of responsibility, and perhaps have the creature divided in its will, defeating the very purposes for which a unity in the executive was instituted. These objections do not lie against such an arrangement as the bill establishes. I conceive that the President is sufficiently accountable to the community; and if this power is vested in him, it will be vested where its nature requires it should be vested; if anything in its nature is executive, it must be that power which is employed in superintending and seeing that the laws are faithfully executed. The laws cannot be executed but by officers appointed for that purpose; therefore, those who are over such officers naturally possess the executive power. If any other doctrine be admitted, what is the consequence? You may set the Senate at the head of the executive department, or you may require that the officers hold their places during the pleasure of this branch of the Legislature, if you cannot go so far as to say we shall appoint them; and by this means you link together two branches of the Government which the preservation of liberty requires to be constantly separated."

Ibid., pp. 499, 500.

Again he said:

"The Constitution affirms that the executive power shall be vested in the President. Are these exceptions to this proposition? Yes, there are. The Constitution says that in appointing to office the Senate shall be associated with the President unless in the case of inferior officers when the law shall otherwise direct. Have we a right to extend this exception? I believe not. If the Constitution has invested all the executive power in the President, I venture to assert that the Legislature has no right to diminish or modify his executive authority. The question then resolves itself into this: is the power of displacing an executive power? I conceive that if any power whatsoever is in its nature executive it is the power of appointing, overseeing, and controlling those who execute the laws."—Ibid., p. 463.

Mr. President, I have but one additional citation to make, and I shall then relieve the Senate from these copious extracts in which I have indulged. I read from the protest of Andrew Jackson, dated April 15, 1834, and directed to the Senate of the United States, the extract being upon the very question involved in this debate, the very question raised by this bill. He says:

"The executive power vested in the Senate is neither that of 'nominating' nor 'appointing.' It is merely a check upon the executive power of appointment. If individuals proposed for appointment by the President are by them deemed incompetent or unworthy, they may withhold their consent, and the appointment cannot be made. They check the action of the Executive, but cannot, in relation to those very subjects, act themselves, nor direct him. Selections are still made by the President, and the negative given to the Senate without diminishing responsibility furnishes an additional guarantee to the country that the subordinate executive as well as the judicial offices shall be filled with worthy and competent men."

"The whole executive power being vested in the President, who is responsible for its exercise, it is a necessary consequence that he should have a right to employ agents of his own choice to aid him in the performance of his duties and to discharge them when he is no longer willing to be responsible for their acts. In strict accordance with this principle the power of removal, which, like that of appointment, is an original executive power, is left unchecked by the Constitution in relation to all executive officers, for whose conduct the President is responsible, while it is taken from him in relation to judicial officers, for whose acts he is not responsible. In the government from which many of the fundamental principles of our system are derived, the head of the executive department originally had power to appoint and remove at will all officers, executive and judicial. It was to take the judges out of this general power of removal, and thus make them independent of the Executive, that the tenure of their offices was changed to good behavior. Nor is it conceivable why they are placed in our Constitution upon a tenure different from that of all other officers appointed by the Executive unless it be for the same purpose."

"But if there were any just ground for doubt on the face of the Constitution, whether all executive officers are removable at the will of the President, it is obviated by the contemporaneous construction of the instrument and the uniform practice under it."

"The power of removal was a topic of solemn debate in the Congress of 1789 while organizing the administrative departments of the Government, and it was finally decided that the President derived from the Constitution the power of removal, so far as it regards that department for whose acts he is responsible. Although the debate covered the whole ground, embracing the Treasury as well as all the other executive departments, it arose on a motion to strike out of the bill to establish a Department of Foreign Affairs, since called the Department of State, a clause declaring the Secretary 'to be removable from office by the President of the United States.'"

And then proceeds in explanation of the subsequent proceedings on that bill as I have already read them from the original record. He proceeds:

"This change having been made for the express purpose of declaring the sense of Congress that the President derived the power of removal from the Constitution, the act as it passed has always been considered as a full expression of the sense of the Legislature on this important part of the American Constitution."

"Here, then, we have the concurrent authority of President Washington, of the Senate, and the House of Representatives, numbers of whom had taken an active part in the Convention which framed the Constitution and in the State conventions which adopted it, that the President derived an unqualified power of removal from that instrument itself, which is

'beyond the reach of legislative authority.' Upon this principle the Government has now been steadily administered for about forty-five years, during which there have been numerous removals made by the President or by his direction, embracing every grade of executive officers, from the heads of Departments to the messengers of bureaus."

The argument is then carried on and applied to the particular case upon which disagreement had arisen between himself and the Senate, to wit: the case of the head of the Treasury Department, the incumbent of which had been dismissed by him in the recess in connection with the well-known question regarding the removal of the deposits.

I have thus gone over, in the first place, the leading points of the argument from the point of view in which the subject has presented itself to my mind; and next, I have shown by the authorities cited how those views and opinions supported by me are rooted and founded in the strongest authority which our political history can furnish; that this authority begins with the organization of the Government, and that along with it is to be taken the uniform practice of the Government for a period of seventy-seven years. President Jackson expressed his surprise in 1834 that, after a period of forty-five years, in which the practice of the Government had been in a certain direction, it should be called in question. How much more reason have we in 1867 to express surprise that a question which has stood determined for seventy-seven years, and the determination of which is sustained by uniform practice and by the highest authorities, should now be involved in debate!

Why is this? Has there been any demand of public opinion brought to bear upon us on this particular point? Has any new light from any quarter been shed upon the Constitution? Why is this bill introduced, and why is it pressed? There is but one explanation. The reason is avowed. It is not concealed; it is not held back. It is, that the President of the United States is not in complete political accord with the majority of the Senate, and therefore this bill is to be passed to put a bit into his mouth to curb and to check him, to prevent him from exercising a power which has been exercised almost unquestioned by all his predecessors. Sir, if I am correct in my argument, and if the great men of former times were correct in their views on this subject, you have no power to pass this bill even for the high object avowed of curbing, limiting, and restraining the President of the United States in the exercise of his powers.

But is there such pressing necessity that we ought to overleap all practice and set aside the past construction of the Constitution? Why, sir, after all that has happened, after all that has been said, there can be no question that two thirds of the offices of the United States, even in the adhering States—the States which did not rebel—are held by persons who are in accord with the political majority in the Senate. This thing of removals has not been carried to such lengths that it is necessary to resort to extreme and doubtful measures of legislation in order to find security and relief to an oppressed majority in this Chamber; and there is no such necessity impending. As was well said by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] in this very debate, the exercise of this power of removal by the present President has not been carried to such an extent as it was by former ones. No political proscription of officers in this country was ever carried to greater lengths than it was carried by President Lincoln and those associated with him in the executive branch of this Government. This power—I acknowledge it to be a fearful, a terrible power in the hands of one disposed to abuse it—was wielded by him and his political associates with an absence of all consideration for opposing opinion and private interests which had no example in our previous political history. It was wielded strongly and with power by that man of iron from whose protest I have read to you, and by other Presidents. I repeat there is less reason now, upon the ground alleged by the advocates of this bill for its enactment, than there was for such a measure upon many former occasions, some of them recent and others more remote.

Why, then, is this measure introduced to revolutionize the practice of the Government and to unsettle the fixed and declared opinions of the American people and of their authorities upon this question? Is it because gentlemen suppose that the public mind is so unfixed by revolution, by war, and by the passions of this war, that it will assent to anything demanded by party interests or instigated by party passion? Is it under the inspiration of popular elections held and determined upon other considerations than this that we are to see the inauguration of a new system in our Government with reference to the patronage of the Government, which changes altogether the relations of the legislative and executive departments with each other; which puts this Senate at the head of the executive department, to dominate it; which makes it the two-headed monster which was spoken of in the debate of 1789?

I beg Senators to reflect upon the several points elaborated by me against the deposition of this power in the Senate, independent of the question of power. I beg them to consider the irresponsibility of this body, an appropriate fact enough when you consider the Senate in its legislative capacity as a check upon the popular House, as a sort of breakwater against the popular passions of any particular year. It is to stand here and perform in this Government the same function which is performed in the British Government by the House of Lords. It is to check and to hold in restraint popular impulses when they first appear, and when they may carry the Government out of its course and establish injustice or mischief in its administration. That is the great function of the Senate. It is a check upon the hot and heady passions which may hold sway over the other branch of the legislative department. But, sir, never in theory or in practice was it intended that this Senate should dominate the executive department. You have a complete veto upon the House. No bill or resolution passed by that branch can take effect or have force as a public law or regulation until you assent to it. The House cannot overrule your dissent to a measure as Congress can overrule a presidential veto. You hold by a fast grip that popular branch which speaks the heart of the people and speaks the passions of the people whenever their rashness or injustice require a check.

It may be said that the Senate is the aristocratic feature of the Constitution, and it may be said, as it was said in the Convention of 1787, that it is objectionable for this reason, and that it ought not to be admitted into the Constitution. On the contrary, I think the provisions creating it were among the wisest provisions of the Constitution; that the Senate should be constituted as it is, that here calm thought and just action should take refuge against the passions of the time. But to have a Senate performing its appropriate, constitutional functions, holding this Government steady in its course, protecting it against impulse and passion and violence, you must have it as the Constitution made it, and as it has heretofore existed, a body substantially separated from questions of private emolument, from questions of official patronage and management. As can be shown, your action upon appointments does not constitute efficient control of or active participation in executive power. You must not have the officers of this country tied to the skirts of Senators and pulling upon them. You must not run the risk of a corrupt influence upon this body. You must not make it an interested participant in the hot, ardent discussions of the country with reference to these questions of patronage.

Then, sir, keeping it separate, as it has been heretofore, allowing it only when important officers are to be selected by the executive department to express its opinion, not to go into investigations such as would be necessary in cases of removal, it will perform its appropriate functions and preserve its just influence. Selected as its members are from every State of the Union, they have a general knowledge of character and of competency in men who are to be selected for public stations, and when the President asks their opinion or advice they can give it in a summary manner. This power of advice gives dignity to the proceedings of Government; but the Senate does not select these officers. Ordinarily, it does not reject them. It is a power not odious; it is a power which does not connect the Senate too intimately with questions of money and office, but leaves its dignity intact and its influence unbroken. I desire it to maintain its character, to be what it was intended to be, the great House of the States, where their voice shall be spoken and their will and their opinions upon public affairs maintained; that it shall not be an active instrument in the scrambles for office in the country; that it shall not be tied to the interests of men who hold lucrative positions under the Government; that it shall not attempt to dictate to the President whom he shall select for office, because that will be the effect of giving new power over removals; that men shall not come here and through Senators dictate appointments and removals to the executive department; that you shall not render that department contemptible; and finally, that you shall not extend to this branch of the Legislature a jurisdiction which it cannot exercise without public odium, without a loss of its own dignity, nor without injury to that system of government which we are all bound, so far as our efforts will go, to maintain in its original integrity and in its former lustre.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] to the third section of the amendment of the committee, to insert after the word "Senate," in the ninth line of that section, the words "or if no appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall be made to any office the term of which shall expire during any session of the Senate, before the expiration of that session."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted, for the reason that it interferes with and is contradictory to the theory of the main body of the amended bill. If that theory is right, this amendment I think ought not to go in. The bill proceeds upon the ground that every officer who is rightfully and regularly appointed, and who has not been suspended for some good cause, shall continue to exercise the functions of that office until he shall be removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and his successor appointed, and until his term having expired his successor shall have been agreed upon. Now, then, if the amendment of my friend from Wisconsin is agreed to, the effect of it will be simply this: that in the case of an officer whose term expires, and his successor does not happen to be appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate, the office becomes vacant; the holder of the office goes out with the expiration of the term, and then some subordinate who happens to be present, and upon whom in the case of a vacancy the law would devolve the duty of performing the duty until the office was filled, will exercise the functions of it. It appeared to the committee, and I think it will commend itself to the sense of the Senate, that in a case of that description where there is no charge against the officer and where the only reason why he is to continue at all is the fact that his successor is not yet agreed upon, it would be better to allow the old officer to continue to exercise the functions of the office until his successor shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, instead of declaring that the office shall be vacant at the expiration of the term.

And that is the law in a great many, I was about to say all the States respecting State appointments, municipal officers—all those persons who discharge the functions of executing the laws of the various States. They are generally appointed for a particular period of time and until their successors shall be duly chosen or appointed and qualified, it being thought more fit that a person against whom no charge is brought and whose term has expired should continue to exercise the functions of the office ad interim until his successor is chosen than that the office should be vacant. I should hope, therefore, that the Senate would not declare that at the expiration of the term of an officer who is appointed for four years, and while the question of who is to be his successor is being considered, the office should be vacant and be performed by some subordinate. I fail to see the necessity or the propriety of it. I hope that amendment may not be agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I am satisfied, after listening to the explanation of the Senator from Vermont, that I was mistaken in offering this amendment. The purpose I was aiming at was precisely the purpose which he says is accomplished, and which I think on reflection is accomplished by the first section of the bill; and therefore I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That amendment being withdrawn, I will renew the amendment which I proposed a few days ago, to strike out all of the third section after the word "thereafter," in the sixth line. I do not propose further to discuss it.

The words proposed to be stricken out were read as follows:

And if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to such office so vacant or temporarily filled, as aforesaid, during such next session of the Senate, such office shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto, until the same shall be filled by appointment thereto, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and during such time all the powers and duties belonging to such office shall be exercised by such other officer as may by law exercise such powers and duties in case of a vacancy in such office.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That all officers or agents, except clerks of Departments, now appointed by the President or by the head of any Department, whose salary or compensation, derived from fees or otherwise, exceeds $1,000 annually, shall be nominated by the President and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the term of all such officers or agents who have been appointed since the 1st day of July, 1863, either by the President or by the head of a Department, without the advice and consent of the Senate, shall expire on the last day of February, 1867.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. It is a very sweeping proposition. We cannot tell, without a careful investigation by some committee, precisely what officers it will operate upon, whether it ought to go so far as it does; and it bears on the face of it as connected with this bill, which is a general one relating to the powers and duties of the Senate, an implication that it is one part of the purpose of this bill to undo something which the President has done. Now, that is an incorrect idea to be entertained respecting the propositions embraced in this bill. It is precisely the idea that the opponents of the bill are most anxious to have the country take up and adopt.

I hope that my friend from Massachusetts will not insist upon loading an important bill of this description, which is to settle a high principle, with a mere matter of detail, which needs investigation, which is certainly open to the implication and the imputation that it is designed to be made the cover for repairing some wrong which the President of the United States has done. It has no fit place as an amendment to this bill. It might just as well be applied to any other bill; and any other proposition respecting the administration of affairs might just as well be loaded on this bill. It is a subject separate and distinct, one that belongs to itself, that ought to be considered by itself, because all that this bill undertakes to do is to regulate the tenure of office, and not to name the classes of persons who shall be treated as principal officers in the Government, so to speak, and be nominated and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as distinguished from those inferior offices suggested in the Constitution, the appointment of which may be vested in the President or the heads of Departments or the courts of law. I trust that my friend from Massachusetts will not encumber this measure, possibly endanger it, by loading it with a variety of questions which grow out of his amendment, which have no proper relation to the bill, and which expose it to animadversion and expose it to criticism which does not justly belong to the measure itself.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the proposition that I have offered now I moved yesterday on another bill in a slightly different form, but it was substantially the same. I did not understand at that time that there was any objection to it in principle. It was opposed as not being germane to the bill in hand; or if it was germane to the bill in hand, its adoption on that bill was supposed in some way to embarrass its passage. On that ground, as I understand, it was opposed. It was not opposed on its merits. Senators who spoke against it avowed their partiality to it, if I understood them aright, and they said that if they had an opportunity on any proper bill they would vote for it.

Well, sir, I now move it again on another bill, to which I believe all will admit that it is entirely germane. There is no suggestion that it is not germane. It is completely in order. But the objection of the Senator from Vermont, if I understand him, is, that it may interfere somewhat with the symmetry of his bill; it may introduce an element which he, who has that bill in charge and now conducts it so ably, had not intended to introduce. Very well, sir, that may be said; but I do not think it is a very strong objection to the measure.

Then again, if I understood the Senator aright, he said that this amendment if ingrafted on his bill might endanger it. I think he is mistaken in that. I think so far from endangering it, it would give it strength.

Mr. HOWE. Merit.

Mr. SUMNER. My friend says merit. It would give it both strength and merit. Why would it give it both strength and merit? Because it is a proposition which grows out of the exigency of the hour. His bill on a larger scale is just such a proposition: it grows out of the exigency of the hour; and that is the strength and the merit of his original bill. We shall pass that, if we do pass it—and I hope we shall—in order to meet a crisis. We all feel its necessity. But the proposition which I now move grows equally out of the exigencies of the hour. If it is ingrafted on the bill, it will be like the original measure, to meet the demands of the moment. It will be because without it we shall leave something undone which we ought to do.

Now, I ask Senators about me is there any one who doubts that under the circumstances such a provision as this ought to pass? Is there any one who doubts, after what we have seen on a large scale, that the President, for the time being at least, ought to be deprived of the extraordinary function which he has exercised? He has announced openly in a speech that he meant to "kick out of office" present incumbents, and it was in that proceeding, "kicking out of office," that on his return to Washington afterward he undertook to remove incumbents wherever he could. Now, sir, it seems to me that we owe our protection to these incumbents so far as possible. It belongs to the duty of the hour. If the Senator from Vermont will tell me any other way in which this proposition can be promoted successfully I shall gladly follow him; but until then I think that I ought to insist that it shall share the fortunes of the bill which he is now conducting, "enjoy its triumph, and partake its gale." If his bill succeeds, then let this measure, which is as good as the bill, succeed also.

But the suggestion has been made that the proposition should be matured perhaps in a committee. Why, sir, the proposition is very simple. Any one can mature it who applies his mind to it for a few moments. But, sir, it has already been before the Senate now for several days, discussed once, twice, three times, I think, not elaborately, but still discussed, so that its merits have been brought to the attention of the Senate; and beside its discussion in open Senate I am a witness that it has been canvassed in conversation much. There are many Senators with whom I have had an opportunity of conversing upon it who have applied their minds to it, and I may say that in offering it now I do not merely speak for myself but for others, and the proposition in the form in which it is now proposed is not merely my own, but it is the proposition of many other Senators on this floor to whose careful supervision it has been submitted. Therefore, sir, I say that the proposition is matured, so far as that may be needed, and there is no reason why the Senate now having it before it should not act upon it. Why postpone what is in itself so essentially good? Why put off to some unknown future the chance of applying a remedy to an admitted abuse? Is there any one here who insists that this is not an abuse, that here has not been a tyrannical exercise of power? No one. Then, sir, let us apply the remedy. This is the first chance we can get. Let us take it.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Senator from Massachusetts intimates that all of us who opposed this amendment yesterday and other days substantially admitted that it was right in itself, and merely contended that it ought not to be attached to the bill then under consideration. For one I do not admit that proposition. When he first introduced the amendment I had very strong doubts of its propriety, and reflection has only confirmed me in those doubts.

He says this proposition has been matured. I believe that even if Senators have thought of this proposition there are only a few here who know to what extent it reaches. There are only a few of us who understand it in its details. I undertake to say to the Senate here to-day that this proposition includes thousands upon thousands of officers now appointed by the different heads of Departments. It includes, or may include, all the assistant assessors now appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury on the recommendation of the assessors, numbering at least two thousand in this Union. It also includes all the inspectors and weighers and gaugers and clerks in the various custom-houses in this country, now appointed nominally by the Secretary of the Treasury, but on the recommendation generally of the collectors. Is it desirable that these appointments should be made by the President of the United States and sent here to the Senate to lumber up and incur the business of this body? I think not, sir. I think it better that practically the collectors of the different custom-houses should have these appointments as they now have them. It also includes, as I believe, the employés in the various navy-yards in this country, now appointed by the Secretary of the Navy or heads of bureaus under him. I think this amendment is of very doubtful policy indeed, and I hope it will not be ingrafted on this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When the honorable Senator from Massachusetts first suggested this proposition I had very great doubts about it. My doubts have continued and they are as strong now as they were in the beginning. I cannot tell exactly how far the proposition may extend; but experience has satisfied me that all legislation of this kind which is directed to the overthrow of a practice upon which the Government has proceeded for years, in fact since its foundation, under laws passed by Congress regulating the different Departments and the connections of the different Departments, and particularly such legislation adopted on the spur of the moment, without having an examination by a committee to see what its operation will be, is very dangerous in itself, and for that reason I was opposed to acting upon the proposition when he first submitted it until it should have had a thorough examination.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts says its operation is easy to understand, nobody can have a doubt of its propriety, and therefore all we have got to do is to pass it. My friend from Massachusetts is peculiar in that respect. There are others like him, I know; I do not mean to say that he stands alone, but when anything appears clear to his own mind he cannot imagine that it is not perfectly clear to everybody else, both as to its propriety and its correctness, and therefore the man who doubts it either wants honesty or wants intelligence.

Mr. SUMNER. No.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That seems to be the idea of the Senator's speeches at any rate. If he does not think so, he does not talk as he thinks. The obvious inference from my friend's style of argument is, that where he is clear, everybody else ought to be; and if everybody else is not, it is owing to some defect in everybody else and not in him.

Now, sir, the facts stated by my honorable friend from New Hampshire are incontrovertible. There are thousands of officers in this country who from the foundation of the Government and under the operation of existing laws have been appointed by the heads of Departments without being confirmed by the Senate, and they have been increasing; and it is so from the necessity of the case, and no particular evil has been found to follow from it. These persons are employés, if you please to call them so, in the different Departments of the Government that have been specified by my honorable friend from New Hampshire. Take the city of New York; there are connected with the New York custom-house a very large number of inspectors, a very large number of weighers and gaugers, and other officers, appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury generally on the nomination of the collector himself who is at the head of the office. The law so provides, and has provided for it from the beginning of our custom-house system. It results from the necessity of the case. The head of the office is the best judge as to who are the men who may properly be employed to discharge these various duties, and consequently the nomination has been left to him, and the appointment is made by the head of the Department here confirming that nomination, he being responsible for the execution of the laws in his Department for the collection of duties and for the proper conduct of the Department itself.

Sir, contemplate what a state of things would be produced if you brought the nominations of all these minor custom-house officers who receive over $1,000 a year (and there are very few of them now who do not receive that) to the President, to be sent by him to the Senate for confirmation. It would introduce at the White House "confusion worse confounded," infinitely beyond anything that we see there now. He would not be able to judge of the qualifications of all these various persons. It would bring all these offices into party politics in the most objectionable manner. Every man holding an office or desiring one would be besetting those supposed to have influence; and if I should continue to be a member of Congress I should not want the additional curse (for it is bad enough now) of having these minor officers all coming to me with their letters and petitions and grumbling and growling and swearing if they could not have their own way. I prefer to leave the matter to the officer who is at the head of the proper Department and who is properly responsible.

Again, there must be a proper responsibility about this. No man can take a department like the New York custom-house or Boston custom-house and carry it on if every subordinate under him who receives $1,000 a year is at liberty to run to the President with reference to his appointment, and from the President to the Senate. It cannot be done. Then look at your internal revenue officers. There are few of those officers, none but the absolute heads of the various offices, the assessors and collectors, whose nominations are submitted to the Senate. The minor officers, assistant assessors, &c., generally receive more than $1,000 a year. If all these officers are to be sent here for confirmation it will create additional confusion.

I give these as instances; there are undoubtedly others which I cannot think of, and which my friend has not thought of; and here it is proposed at one dash to overturn this whole system, because the President, in an unlucky moment, said, or is said to have said, (and I suppose he did say it,) that he would kick certain men out of office. I am not disposed to overturn a system which has recommended itself to the experience of the Government, recommended itself to the most approved mode of doing the business of the country for years, with which no fault whatever has been found in its practical operation, simply because at this time we are in this "muss" with regard to appointments. The danger is always in such cases that we shall go too far, and that in trying to do good we shall do infinite harm; and that, I think, would be the result if we should adopt the system which my friend from Massachusetts recommends.

Allow me to say to him in all kindness and in all respect that I do not think he has considered this matter, because he has not been aware of the facts upon which the present state of the law is founded; and I believe if you were to put him upon a committee to investigate it, and he should get at the facts as they really stand, and examine the system as it has operated with reference to the collection of our revenues, he himself would be the first man to say that he had come to a mistaken opinion with reference to the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. What facts?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The facts that I have been stating. How could you dispose of the thousands of men employed in the collection of the internal revenue and the customs? Would you have all their names come here for confirmation, every weigher and gauger, every inspector, every revenue agent?

Mr. SUMNER. All that are now appointed by the head of a Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Would you have them all go to the President and then come here for confirmation? I do not want them to come here. I think it would be a bad system. I think we cannot carry it into the details of these minor offices. What did the Constitution mean when it gave to Congress the power to vest the appointment of such inferior offices as it saw fit in the heads of the Departments? It meant that there must be from the nature of the case, in a country like this, many instances where you must leave the appointing power to somebody else, where you cannot burden the President with all these little appointments. In a country as large as this is, and growing as it is, increasing every day, and the number of offices increasing continually, the thing would become utterly impracticable. If it were attempted we might resolve ourselves into a Senate in perpetual session to consider mere questions of nominations to office, and we should be obliged to do so. It would be utterly impossible that we could arrive at any correct conclusion with the thousands of other matters we have to attend to. I think, therefore, we had better "let well enough alone," and not because we happen just at this moment to be in the condition we are with reference to questions of appointments to office, travel beyond what the necessity of the case requires.

A word now, sir, upon the general subject. I have not been able to give my attention to the details of the bill, because I have been necessarily out of the Senate while the bill has been under consideration; but with reference to the bill itself I have the impression that we ought to confine ourselves to what is necessary in order to protect the constitutional rights of the Senate, and not allow ourselves to be carried away by our rightful and proper impressions with regard to that one point, to take action upon collateral issues and collateral matters, which would look as if they were sought out merely for the purpose of embarrassment, would have that appearance at any rate to the country, and would eventuate in embarrassing ourselves and those who are to come after us by going a great deal too far.

As I said before, I do not think I should have been in favor of passing any law upon this subject had it not been that it is manifest to me that the time has come (as I gave notice at the last session it might come) when it is perfectly evident a doctrine prevails which is utterly subversive of the constitutional rights of the Senate. The Senate is bound to protect itself if it can, and if it cannot Congress is bound to protect its coordinate branch and the constitutional rights of its coordinate branch. As I stated the other day, here is a plain, palpable case; and it is said that the present Attorney General has given an opinion that the President had a perfect right to nominate a man to the Senate, and if the Senate rejected him to wait until the Senate adjourned and then appoint him again, and so on from session to session until at last we should be made a mere cipher, a nobody in the Government.

If the present Attorney General has given any such opinion, so much the more necessary is it for us to protect ourselves. If the President in his action—I am sorry he has taken the action—has seen fit to proceed upon such an opinion and to treat the Senate with that which I must call discourtesy, disregard of its constitutional rights, by reappointing men after they had been rejected by the Senate to the same offices, the moment the Senate had adjourned, it is time for us to exert such power as we may have in order to protect ourselves—not ourselves individually, but to protect the body of which we are members in the exercise of its constitutional rights. Inasmuch as this opinion has been given and this action has been taken, I am disposed to test it; and I am ready to go just so far as is necessary to accomplish that end; but I am not willing, because I think it unwise, to go further and to take occasion from that circumstance to put restrictions upon the power of the Executive that we may find it afterward difficult to justify, or to take occasion to overturn the settled practice of the Government under existing laws which has been useful, and of which there has been no complaint, and of which there is no complaint to this day. I should regret very much if anything of the kind should be done; and I am therefore opposed utterly to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Maine, he will pardon me, proceeds upon an exaggeration. It is very easy to answer an argument when you begin by exaggerating the consequences from that argument. Now, sir, the Senator warns us against my proposition, because he says it would impose so much business upon the Senate. Is that true? He reminds us of the number of appointments that we should be obliged to act upon in the internal revenue department. How many? The assistant assessors. What others? Those can be counted.

Mr. CRAGIN. Inspectors under the internal revenue laws.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; inspectors also; those can all be counted. He then reminds us of the officers in the custom-houses, who would be brought to the Senate. They can all be counted. It would not act on the clerks in the custom-houses; it acts only, if at all, on the officers of the custom-houses, officers in a certain sense superior, some of them with very considerable responsibility. They can all be counted. It is very easy to say that we shall be obliged to deal with many thousands, but I say, nevertheless, they can all be counted.

But, let me ask, are we not obliged to deal with many thousands of postmasters, and still further are we not obliged to deal with many thousands of officers in the Army? How have we carried this great war along? The Senate has acted always upon all the nominations of the Executive for the Army of the United States, beginning with the general and ending with a second lieutenant. Every one of them comes before the Senate, and what is the consequence? The Executive has a direct responsibility to the Senate with regard to every appointment that it makes in the Army of the United States from a general down to a second lieutenant. And are you disposed to renounce that responsibility because it brings into this Chamber many thousand nominations, if you please, to act upon? These officers that I now wish to bring into the Chamber for you to act upon, some of them you may consider as second lieutenants in the civil service of the country; others as first lieutenants; others as captains, if you please. And now, why should we act upon them?

Having answered the argument which I have called the argument of exaggeration, now why should we act upon these? The Senator says we had better follow the received system. One of the finest sentiments that has fallen from one of the most gifted of our fellow-countrymen was that verse in which he says:

"Now occasions teach new duties."

We have a new occasion now teaching a new duty. That new occasion is the misconduct of the Executive of the United States, and the new duty which this occasion teaches is, that Congress should exercise all its powers in throwing a shield over our fellow-citizens. We see that the Executive is determined to continue this warfare upon the incumbents of office: shall we not if possible protect them? I say that it is our duty growing out of this hour. It may not be our duty next year, or four years from now, as it was not our duty last year or four years back. But because it may not be our duty next year, and was not our duty last year, it does not follow that it is not our duty now. Let us act in the present according to the exigency of this moment; and if there is an abuse, as no one will hesitate I think to admit, let us meet it carefully, considerably, and bravely.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to say a word.

Mr. HOWARD. Take to-morrow.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to offer a resolution pertinent to the present inquiry. If its consideration be objected to, of course I shall not call it up until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan withdraw the motion?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; I must insist on my motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOWARD. I will withdraw the motion if the Senator from Maine will renew it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall renew it unless the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to reply to me.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator withdraw his motion that I may offer a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. HOWARD. There seems to be a great deal of distress. [Laughter.] I think I had better withdraw my motion. I feel kindly to the honorable Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of the Interior, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General be directed to inform the Senate what number of removals from office and appointments to office were made in their respective Departments from March 4, 1861, to March 4, 1865, and the dates of said removals and appointments, and the names of said appointees and their location.

Several SENATORS objected to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Massachusetts, in remarking that my argument on a particular point was one of exaggeration, did not choose to take notice of the part of the argument which I consider of very much more importance than that which he did answer. I observed incidentally that I thought it would be very inconvenient for us to have these thousands of minor officers come here to be acted upon. That was the only part of the argument which the Senator thought fit to notice. But, sir, there was something beyond that which I called his attention to, and that is the infinite trouble and confusion it would make even with the President if he was obliged to make all these nominations, and the want of proper information that he would have. The proper information now comes from the head of the office where the officer is to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is at the head of the Department and responsible for what is done in the Department. There is the distinction, and it is a pretty important one; and I put that upon the ground that it was better so, infinitely better so, as a matter of practice, than it would be if these men were to come necessarily to the President and next to the Senate; that the system is not so good a one; that the present system is one which was decided upon after proper consideration, and has been in existence from the foundation of the Government, and has been found to work well in practice.

Because we happen to have a President at the present time who is not doing what we think to be right in reference to this matter, is it worth while for us to change this system which has been found so good and beneficial for so many years? The present President, if the Senator finds fault with him, cannot live forever, cannot be President forever, unless the people choose to reelect him from time to time. A change will come in the natural order of things, and then when we get a President to suit us I suppose the Senator would be for putting things back again and taking away this power. We should look rather small and trifling to do anything of that kind. Therefore I repeat what I said: let us do what is necessary, under the contingency, to protect the position and the constitutional rights of the Senate itself with reference to appointments, and not run the thing into the ground by taking every possible power out of the hands of, not of the President, for it is not in his hands now, but out of the hands of the heads of Departments, and taking everything to ourselves to act upon. Sir, I do not think it would be wise; and the Senator will allow me to say that if he considers my argument one of exaggeration I consider his one of declamation, and exaggeration is certainly as good as declamation for an argument, in the Senate at any rate.

There is a reason which is applicable to officers of the Army which is not applicable to these officers. They take their offices for life. Those appointments exist as long as they behave well. It is a very different thing from these little appointments in the civil service, which are held only for two or three years, more or less. That is a matter that is dependent on something else.

Mr. SUMNER. As I do not wish to revive this discussion to-morrow and the Senator from Maine may not be in his seat—

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I have only one word to say. I wish to say that I intended to answer his argument fully and frankly. I thought that I had done it. He thinks that I did not do it because I did not take into consideration the superiority of the present system and the inconvenience that would result to the President and the appointing power generally by having to act upon all these nominations. I think that I did take that into consideration. I intended to, because it seems to me that it is answered by all that I undertook to say when I was up before. I did not undertake to express any opinion on the system as a system for the time past, nor did I on the system as a system for the future. I spoke of what we ought to do at the present moment. And as the Senator from Maine suggests that because we are in embarrassed relations with the Executive, because there is what he calls a "muss" with regard to executive appointments, therefore we should not undertake to act by legislation for the future, let me say that I propose to act simply for the present. I wish to meet the present exigency; and when to-morrow comes, if happily we see a clearer sky, I shall then hearken gladly to the Senator from Maine and follow him in sustaining the old system; but meanwhile I think the old system has ceased to be applicable. It does not meet the case. It was good enough when we had a President who was in harmony with this Chamber; but it is not good enough now. We owe it therefore to ourselves and to those who look to us for protection to apply the remedy.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 15, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

IMPROVEMENT OF ST. CLAIR FLATS.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be requested to take into consideration, with as little delay as possible, the proposed improvement of the St. Clair Flats, in the State of Michigan, by means of a new channel or a canal; and if the said committee deem the construction of the same expedient, that they make report to this House with a bill or joint resolution containing a specific appropriation of a sufficient sum of money to defray the expense of the work.

CAPTURE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Mr. COBB. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill to authorize the payment of the reward offered by the President for the capture of Jefferson Davis, be instructed to ascertain and report to this House the facts connected with said capture, and the connection of the fourth Michigan and first Wisconsin cavalry regiments therewith, if any, together with the evidence taken in the case, and that in the prosecution of said investigation the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. STEVENS. Is this a resolution of instruction or one of inquiry?

Mr. BLAINE. Let it be read again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. STEVENS. I shall not object to the resolution provided it refers this matter to the Committee of Claims, to whom this subject was originally referred.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection to that, and will modify the resolution in that way.

There being no objection to the resolution as modified, it was received and agreed to.

MARYLAND ELECTION.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege, which will be explained by the following preamble and resolution which I now offer:

Whereas by the constitution and laws of the State of Maryland persons who were disloyal to the Government of the United States, or gave aid and encouragement to the recent rebellion, are deprived of the elective franchise; and whereas it is alleged that at the last election in the State of Maryland large numbers of the persons disqualified as aforesaid did vote for Representatives in the Fortieth Congress and other officers; and whereas it is further alleged that armed forces of the United States were ordered by Federal authority to, and did, cooperate with the Executive of the State of Maryland and others who were engaged with him in overriding the constitution and laws aforesaid, and in securing the vote of rebels and persons disqualified as aforesaid, and whereby loyal and qualified voters of Maryland were deterred from the free exercise of the elective franchise and from resisting and preventing the violation of the constitution and laws aforesaid: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections shall inquire into and report whether the constitution and laws have been violated as aforesaid, and whether the President or any one under his command has in any manner interfered with the said election, or has in any way used or threatened to use the military power of the nation with reference to the said election, and if so, whether it was upon the requisition of the Governor of Maryland; and the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. LE BLOND. I rise to a question of order. I submit that this resolution is not of such a nature as entitles the gentleman from New York to offer it as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution related to the election of members to this Congress it would be a matter of privilege; but as it relates to the election of members of the next Congress it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. WARD, of New York. Then I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.

TAX ON CIGARS.

Mr. DEMING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to inquire into the expediency of repealing the ad valorem tax on domestic cigars, and of reducing the specific tax to a uniform rate of five dollars per thousand.

INDIAN SLAVERY IN NEW MEXICO, ETC.

Mr. ROSS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is currently reported that "the sum of all villainies" is still being perpetrated by trading in human flesh in the purchase and sale of Indians in the Territories of the United States known as New Mexico and Colorado: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed diligently and promptly to inquire into the truth of said representations, and report to this House at an early day what congressional action, if any, is necessary to secure to every person within the national jurisdiction protection, liberty, and equality before the law, without distinction of race, color, or sex.

DAKOTA AND MONTANA WAGON-ROAD.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a wagon-road for military and postal purposes through the Territories of Dakota and Montana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

ST. CLAIR FLATS IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the report of Brevet Brigadier General T. J. Craw of survey and estimates for the improvement of the channel over the St. Clair Flats made during the fall of 1866, and all other reports of surveys and estimates for improvement of navigation on the great lakes and their connecting rivers made during that year.

COLONEL H. J. FACH.

Mr. GARFIELD asked and obtained leave for Colonel H. J. Fach to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in relation to his claim, first making and leaving copies of the same.

GOVERNMENT OFFICERS IN BRIDGEPORT.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation for the purpose of the construction of a suitable building in the city of Bridgeport, in the State of Connecticut, for the better and cheaper convenience of the Government offices required to be executed in that growing and prosperous city.

DRAWBACK ON DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, also submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to send to this House a full copy of all the rules and regulations that have been adopted under his direction prescribing what acts shall be done and what evidence shall be furnished by exporters of articles of American manufacture to entitle them to the allowance of drawback provided for by the two hundred and ninety-seventh section of the internal revenue act.

GOLD IN NEW YORK SUB-PREASURY.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment be directed to inquire why, in the present stringent condition of the New York money market, the currency balance in the sub-Treasury in that city is constantly increasing; whether such increase or any part of it arises or has arisen from the sale of gold; and whether any agent of the Department or any officer of the Government has within the last thirty days loaned gold belonging to the Government to any person or persons or to any institution; and if so, to what institution, upon what consideration, for what purpose, upon what security, and to what amount.

MURDER OF CAPTAIN MONTGOMERY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the special committee to investigate the murder of Union men in South Carolina be instructed to inquire into the facts connected with the murder of Captain Montgomery, an officer of the United States, by Confederate soldiers under the command of George W. Chilton, now seeking admission as a member of this House, said Montgomery, as is reported, having been kidnapped in the city of Matamoras, Mexico, carried over the Rio Grande, hung to a tree until dead, and had his head and right arm cut off and sent to his former home in Texas as a trophy.

PAY OF HON. A. H. COFFROTH.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Alexander H. Coffroth the amount of increased pay as a member of this House provided by law, from the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the period when he ceased to be a member.

Mr. KOONTZ. I object.

TUCKER'S BEACH INLET.

Mr. NEWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be requested to inquire into the expediency of placing buoys at an inlet lately formed at Tucker's Beach, in the bay of Little Egg Harbor, on the coast of New Jersey, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

COLORADO MUTUAL BUILDING ASSOCIATION.

Mr. KOONTZ, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the Colored Mutual Building Association of the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

FOREIGN-BORN CITIZENS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. KOONTZ, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia adversely upon the petition of citizens of foreign birth residing in the city of Washington, praying for equal rights and privileges with negroes; which was laid upon the table.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. ALLISON. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of Senate bill No. 456, for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union, which bill was pending at the adjournment yesterday. The previous question has been seconded, and the pending question is upon ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the demand for the previous question was seconded.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to inquire—

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask a question of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. STEVENS. The question pending antecedent to the motion just made is, I believe, Shall the main question be ordered?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. STEVENS. If that question be determined in the negative will it not have the same effect as the reconsideration of the vote seconding the demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. If the main question be not ordered the bill will be divested of the operation of the previous question.

Mr. GHANLER. If the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to lay on the table the motion to reconsider should prevail, what would then be the position of the question?

The SPEAKER. The next question would be, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. THAYER. I call for tellers on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. THAYER and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, were appointed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Cannot this question be taken by yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. The vote on this motion to reconsider cannot be taken by yeas and nays, because the vote on seconding the previous question cannot be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood the Chair to rule differently the other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. The Chair stated on that occasion that the question on reconsidering the vote ordering the main question could be taken by yeas and nays, because the vote on ordering the main question could be so taken. The motion now is to reconsider the vote seconding the previous question.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 77.

So the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, there were—ayes 70, noes 50.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurring on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 50, noes 66.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the third section in the following words: And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason of race or color, (excepting Indians not taxed.) And insert in lieu thereof the following:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act, upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the territorial government within thirty days after the passage of this act, to act upon the condition submitted herein.

Mr. ROSS. I ask whether we are not entitled to a division of the question on this amendment, so that the vote shall first be taken on striking out the third section?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CULLOM.) A motion to strike out and insert is not divisible under the rules of the House.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have not much to add to what has been already said in this debate. Without being well convinced as to the legal effect of the section which is now proposed to be stricken out, I am confident that that section embodies a proposition which ought not to receive the support of Congress in the present condition of public affairs.

We are engaged in the great work of reconstructing this Government, and I suppose if we are committed to anything it is this: that in the ten States not now represented there shall hereafter be no distinction on account of race or color. Our friends in Tennessee are engaged in a life and death struggle for the establishment of the principle that a man as a man has a right to participate in the Government.

In the State of Iowa the contest is now going on for the amendment of their constitution, by which they purpose to strike from the text a provision corresponding exactly to that which is incorporated in the constitution of the proposed State of Nebraska.

Under these circumstances, and after great deliberation, I am resolved as one member not to give my support to any proposition which shall contravene the great purpose we have in view, which the country seeks as the consummation of the great war through which we have passed, the recognition of the rights of all men to participate in the Government of the country.

As a question of public policy in reference to Nebraska, it is clear if Nebraska will not accept through her Legislature the proposition I now submit to this House it is absolutely inconceivable that we should believe Nebraska will obey the proposition the committee has reported here, and which I move be stricken from the text of this bill. It is plain if Nebraska desires to conform to the settled policy of this country in reference to the right of men to participate in the Government, she will speedily accept the proposition we now offer; and if she will not accept this proposition she ought not to be received into this Government as a State, when we are contending with all the strength which the free people of this country can command to secure this same principle in ten revolted and at present rebellious States.

And therefore I am willing to take the ground in reference to Nebraska, to Colorado, to South Carolina, and every State constituted out of new territory, or reorganized out of the old States, that they shall not come here by their representatives until they accept this fundamental principle of a republican form of government. And without further debate on my part, unless some gentleman desires to be heard, I shall ask for the vote.

Mr. HALE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of undertaking to discuss the very momentous proposition which has been put before the House by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] I however wish to say so much as this: that for one I utterly dissent from the whole political doctrine which the gentleman has enunciated. I am not prepared either to take the ground myself or willingly to see this House or the country put themselves upon the ground that no State of this Union, with the exception perhaps of one or two New England States, has ever yet had a republican form of government, for that is the end to which the gentleman's logic leads.

If his doctrine be true, then I am a citizen of a State where no republican form of government exists; and the gentleman from Massachusetts is a citizen of a State which has not a republican form of government.

I do not believe, sir, that the right of suffrage, the right to participate in the Government, is the inalienable right of the individual citizen in any sense whatever. It is a question solely of governmental policy who shall be allowed to take part in the government of the State, in the election of its officers, in making its laws.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me ask the gentleman one question. Suppose a government were formed where every man was excluded from voting and making the laws except twenty named men, what is that?

Mr. HALE. The gentleman will excuse me from answering that question, for the case he puts is not the case the House is considering. What is the character of that government where the powers are lodged in the hands of the few, or of one man, is by no means the question before us. But it seems to me preposterous to claim that a State of this Union, which limits or restricts the right of suffrage in the manner and to the extent which the almost universal and unbroken practice of the States and of the Federal Government from the adoption of the Constitution has sanctioned, has not a republican form of government within the meaning of the Constitution.

Let me put the question back to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. Is that a republican form of government, according to his theory, in which one hundred male citizens of full age may vote and one hundred female citizens of equal intelligence and equal qualification in every other respect cannot vote? We have always recognized the doctrine that the right of suffrage might be limited. We recognize it to-day. I trust we shall never fail to do so, and also to recognize the doctrine that under our Constitution this whole question ought to remain where the Constitution puts it, in the control of the States themselves and not of the Federal Government.

I have already gone further than I intended in the discussion of this question. My purpose when I rose was simply to appeal to gentlemen on this side of the House, and who are disposed to support the principle now laid down by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] or to support any qualification of this kind, not to second the demand for the previous question, but to give an opportunity to gentlemen who wish to discuss it to be heard. And I do it more particularly because the minority in this House has had no opportunity to be heard on this question. I certainly think on a question of such importance as this it would be an act of oppression to deprive them of that opportunity. I beg leave to remind gentlemen that although we are in a great majority here, while it may be excellent—

"To have a giant's strength, yet it is tyrannous
To use it like a giant."

I certainly hope the previous question will not be seconded until a fair opportunity is afforded for discussion.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND.]

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the minority I feel as though I ought to at least tender my sincere thanks to the gentleman who has so kindly extended to me eight minutes of time upon a question that is of great magnitude, one that the Senate of the United States has discussed for days, and one that the American people to-day feel a deeper interest in than perhaps any other one question presented to them, unless it be that of the pretended right to reorganize the Union. Yet, sir, gentlemen having control of this bill are farming out the time chiefly to members upon their own side of the House, occasionally eight minutes to this side. It is refreshing, however, to the minority to find upon the other side some few who still remember that the Constitution of the United States is to be respected even by the majority.

I was no little surprised, however, yesterday, to hear my colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM,] after denouncing the third section of this bill as a usurpation of power on the part of the Federal Government, follow it up by saying that he nevertheless would vote for the bill. It is astounding that men who take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States will boldly assert upon this floor that the very provision they are called to vote upon is a violation of that Constitution, a usurpation on the part of this Congress of the powers of the State, of no more validity than a piece of brown paper, and yet vote for it.

In the limited time that is allotted to me by the kindness of the gentleman from Massachusetts, whose magnanimity and liberality is scarcely paralleled, in the eight minutes that I am permitted to speak upon that great constitutional question, I must proceed simply to state my objection to this proposition, and the reasons why I shall vote against it. It has never been claimed until within the last four years that Congress has any power over the elective franchise in the States, but on the contrary that that power was conferred upon the States by the provisions of the Federal Constitution, and they alone can exercise it. Now, if it be true that we can prevent this State from coming into the Union by fixing conditions precedent to its admission, and that upon the ground that it is not republican in form, then I say that this Congress has power to say to the State of Ohio, which I have the honor to represent in part, that because she permits none but white male citizens over the age of twenty-one years to vote she shall be turned out of the Union as not having a republican form of government. Yet that is the doctrine that is enunciated here—that those States which do not confer upon their citizens suffrage without respect to race or color are not republican in form, and therefore not entitled to representation here. I repeat, if you carry out this doctrine in the admission of Nebraska, you can do it with reference to the States that are in the Union to-day.

The third section of the bill provides—

This act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgement or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason of race or color.

Sir, the constitution of Nebraska was submitted to the proper authority of Nebraska and approved. It is as they wish it, and she now submits this constitution to Congress and asks admission. You say No, unless you conform to our views of republicanism, which is equality before the law; and to accomplish this you seek to force this condition upon them. Sir, I agree with my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] that it is an attempt to usurp power and of no more force than a piece of brown paper. But why do an unconstitutional act, knowing it to be so? Why enforce unnecessary conditions upon a people about to be admitted in the Union because it is believed to be of no force? Why compel them to litigate the question admitted to be unconstitutional? Our duty is to pass no unconstitutional act.

But, sir, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is no less objectionable than the section he wishes to amend, but worse if possible. It requires the territorial Legislature to provide by law for suffrage to all people, without regard to race or color, except Indians not taxed, and then provides this enactment shall be a part of the organic act of Nebraska. This is legislating by Congress for not only the people of a Territory, but for the people of the State after its admission.

Sir, it is not the love of the African that so much disturbs the gentleman; it is to put him in a position that he can be used for power and place.

Having said thus much and my time being up, I must content myself with what I have said.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, the power to admit States implies also the duty of examining and deciding whether they ought in our opinion to be admitted; regard being had to the extent of its population, boundaries, the nature of its constitution, and everything else. What the views of the majority of this House are with reference to the main question underlying this discussion I suppose nobody doubts. It is insisted, however, that these views are embodied in the third section of the bill now before us.

Reference has been made in the course of this debate to the joint resolution providing for the admission of Missouri into the Union, in which a condition was referred back to the Legislature of that State, and it was provided that if before a day named in the resolution that condition was accepted by formal legislation of the State it should be admitted under proclamation of the President without any further action by Congress.

My friend from Ohio on my left [Mr. SHELLEBARGER] intimates that the passage of this third section of the bill would be a moral assurance of the adoption of the principle for which we contend. I submit to him that the moral assurance will be all the other way. The people of Nebraska have adopted a constitution, in which they have restricted the right of suffrage to white men. They have elected a Governor and a Legislature, and have chosen Senators and a Representative who are standing here ready to be admitted the moment that this or any similar bill shall pass. I concede that what are called moral guarantees in political matters are much higher and greater assurances than any forms of legal obligation; but what are the moral obligations of this case? They are that they will adhere to the limitation of the franchise as it stands in their constitution, and nothing else. We may, in passing this bill, intimate to them and to the country what our views and principles are, but we have no assurance that those principles will be regarded or that our views will be adopted by them. On the other hand, all the assurance we have is that they will be disregarded and that our views will not be adopted.

Let us, as we did in the case of West Virginia, submit this proposition to the people of Nebraska, either at the ballot-box or in a convention called for the purpose or by the Legislature now in existence. If they will modify their constitution in this way we shall then have a moral assurance that the principle for which we contend will be incorporated as a fundamental condition into their constitution, an assurance which, to my mind, is of greater validity than any mere provision of law that we may adopt. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HILL] asked yesterday whether if their constitution were now in the form that we desire they might not turn round after their admission and change it. To be sure they might. Undoubtedly, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] intimates, they have full power to do it; but if they came to us with such a constitution we have a moral guarantee that they will not do it; we shall have the highest assurance that any people can give of their future purposes.

I think, therefore, that we ought, in justice to ourselves and to the people we represent, and to what we must regard as their deliberate judgment, to send this question back to the people of Nebraska, and see whether they are willing to give us and the country a guarantee either in the form of a popular vote, a conventional ordinance, or even an act of their Legislature, that in the future they will adhere in good faith to this great principle of suffrage.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will now yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.]

Mr. DELANO took the floor.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment? I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] a single question.

Mr. DELANO. I will yield to the gentleman if it will not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CULLOM in the chair.) It will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. DELANO. Then the gentleman must allow me to proceed.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the Territory of Nebraska have organized a State government and adopted a constitution, and have presented it to the Congress of the United States for their approval. I believe nobody asserts that that government is not republican in form. If any gentleman here does I would be glad that he should say so.

Mr. KELLEY. I do.

Mr. DELANO. Well, sir, in the few remarks that I shall make I shall endeavor to discuss that question. I understand that the objection to the government of Nebraska as being anti-republican is, that it does not extend the right of suffrage to the negro race. I know of no other objection to it, and I shall take it for granted that that is the only objection to it.

Now, if the State government of Nebraska is for this reason not republican in form, I ask how many State governments in this Union are republican in form? I live in a State having exactly the same constitution in that respect; and New York has the same form virtually, there being only qualified negro suffrage in New York. And I venture to assert that there is not over one or two States in the Union that have governments republican in form if the form of government presented to us by the people of Nebraska is not republican in form.

Sir, it is worse than idle for us now to assert that the form of government presented by Nebraska is not republican in form, for that assertion cannot be sustained. The whole history of our nation gives the lie, so to speak, to the assertion that the Nebraska State government is not republican in form. Yet we are asked to refuse the admission of this State, because it has not conformed to the modern idea that we have adopted, that suffrage should be extended to the black race. When the question comes to me in the State of Ohio whether I will vote to reform her constitution or not, I am not prepared to say that I should not vote for its reformation, because I do not wish to be understood as standing behind any gentleman in reference to the question of universal rights and privileges; but I do say that the whole history of our Government shows that we have recognized such governments as this of Nebraska as republican in form, and have admitted the States having them into the Union. And how can we stand back now and deny to this young State the right to come in as a member of the Union upon the same terms? How can we impose upon her conditions which have never been imposed upon the other States now in the Union? Upon what principle can we say to the people who live in Nebraska, "You shall not come into this Union as a State unless you come upon conditions other than those which have been recognized as fit to constitute a State a partner in the great Government of the United States ever since that Government was formed?"

We are called upon to meet this great question, and we may as well meet it here and at once; for I say if we adopt this principle of refusing the admission of a State for this reason and this reason alone, then we condemn ourselves and we condemn a majority of the governments of the States which now constitute portions of the Federal Union. This principle was not admitted or conceded in the constitutional amendment which we proposed at the last session as the basis of the restoration of the ten States yet unrepresented here. On the contrary, as has been already said, a directly different principle was admitted in that amendment. And so in regard to the restoration of the State of Tennessee; we restored her at the last session of Congress with precisely the same principle in her constitution. And we will stultify our action of that time if we deny at this time to the free people of Nebraska the rights which they are demanding at our hands.

Sir, let us see to it that no vain theory or speculative opinions lead us into legislation which will cause us to stand before the world in a position where we cannot defend ourselves. Perhaps I may say that I would rather that the constitution of Nebraska did provide for the exercise of the right of suffrage by the six hundred or less of black people there, giving a voting population of not more than one hundred. But dare we say to the people of Nebraska, "You shall not be admitted into the Union because you have not incorporated such a provision in your constitution of State government?" I put the question to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] and others who hold with him: dare we say to this State that it shall not be admitted because it does not subscribe to the new theory which we intend hereafter to adopt? Go to Pennsylvania and take out of its constitution the same objectionable provision. Try to remove the "beam" from your own eye before you seek to impose such a principle as this upon a young Territory seeking admission into this Union as a State; "for with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DELANO. I hardly have time for questions.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask the gentleman if he believes that we have the discretion to admit or not admit a new State, according as we may be satisfied or otherwise with her constitution, even though it may be republican in form?

Mr. DELANO. I would inquire of the Chair how much time I have left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CULLOM in the chair.) The gentleman has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. DELANO. I do not know what "discretion" this House may have; but if it shall adopt this principle, I shall think it shows very little discretion, [laughter;] that will be my opinion about it. Congress has the power, and it can now exercise it, to say to this young State it shall not be admitted into this Union. It has the power; but I tell you there is the voice of the people behind it, which will hold it accountable for the exercise of that power.

Mr. MAYNARD. I beg to say to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO]—

Mr. DELANO. As I have too little time left to enable me to say anything of moment, I will leave the discussion with what I have already said.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to say, before submitting a proposition to the House, that in the remarks which I have made I have merely expressed my own opinion as to what is a republican form of government. I think the jurisdiction of Congress over a Territory applying for admission into the Union as a State is clear and exclusive.

Our jurisdiction over such States as Ohio and Pennsylvania with reference to the elective franchise is very clearly limited. I do not purpose to enter into any discussion as to what is the power of Congress over the old States in reference to the elective franchise.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman's doctrine is correct—that a State which does not grant impartial suffrage to all men has not a republican form of government—is it not the duty of this Congress to change the constitutions of New York and Pennsylvania, and make them republican in form?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, that is entirely aside from the present question. There is no existing exigency calling upon Congress to interfere in reference to the institutions of the old States that have organized governments. What the power of Congress is with reference to that matter is a different question from that we are now called to consider. My own opinion is that when, by an arbitrary rule, a State deprives a particular class of men and their posterity for all time of participation in the government under which they live, just to that extent the government fails to be republican in form. Whether the exclusion of any small number of persons from participation in the government of any State furnishes occasion, under the Constitution, for the intervention of the Congress of the United States is a very grave question, and one which we are not now called upon to consider. But whether we shall admit into the Union a State formed out of a Territory, over which we have exclusive and continuing jurisdiction, is a different question; because, under the Constitution, we can hold the Territory as a Territory until its people frame a government which we are willing to accept as republican in form.

Mr. Speaker, with these observations I desire to make a proposition to the House. There are many gentlemen about me who desire that this discussion shall extend beyond the hour which I hold under the rules of the House. It is not agreeable to me to be giving to other gentlemen my little remaining time in parcels of five and ten minutes. I therefore make this suggestion to the House: that the debate close at three o'clock this afternoon, and that the question be taken at that time; that I be allowed an opportunity to take the floor at fifteen minutes before three o'clock; that during the intervening time the Chair shall control the assignment of the floor, and that speeches be limited to fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts it will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I voted this morning to reconsider the vote seconding the demand for the previous question because I desired that this question should be open to further discussion by the House. I believed that the hour devoted to the discussion yesterday was not sufficient; that it should be discussed longer and more thoroughly, so that the minds of members might become more settled and clear with regard to these several propositions. Had the vote been taken yesterday I should have voted for the admission of Nebraska under the Senate bill. I should vote the same way today, because I am entirely satisfied with the third section of the bill, which the gentleman from Massachusetts now moves to strike out. Indeed, sir, I am better satisfied with a provision of that kind inserted by the Congress of the United States in the act of incorporation of this State than I would be if the provision were contained merely in the constitution of Nebraska. A convention framing a constitution and putting into it a provision of that kind only gives it vitality and force until another convention is called, which may amend the constitution and change such provision. On the other hand, an act of Congress admitting a State and providing in express terms, as this provision does, that the right of suffrage shall be extended impartially forever is, I verily believe, binding upon the State both morally and legally. Why, sir, if I know anything about this subject, Congress possesses sovereign power over the Territories of the United States. I read in the Constitution that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States;" that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union;" that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." I ask why, under these several provisions of the Constitution, Congress has not authority to ordain in the act admitting a State whatever conditions and provisions it deems fit, and why such enactments are not binding upon the people of that State? The courts of Illinois held long ago that the ordinance of 1787, excluding slavery from the territory northwest of the Ohio, was binding upon the Territories to which it applied after they became States; that slavery could not be introduced there under the sanction of State legislation; that the ordinance ran with the territory and was perpetually binding. So, sir, in my opinion is an act of Congress chartering a State; for this is nothing but a charter.

This act of incorporation imposes terms and conditions upon the corporation as binding upon it. Now, I do not see for my part, and I would like some gentleman more able to discuss this question than I am why there is any reason against it.

I do not see why Congress has not power to make a constitution for a Territory. Why not? Congress may admit new States. Congress exercises jurisdiction over them as Territories. We have entire control—entire sovereignty. Why, then, cannot Congress and the President make a constitution for a Territory and admit her as a State upon that constitution? I know the practice of the Government has been different; but because the practice has been one way is no good reason why the practice may not be another way.

True, it is better the people of a Territory should make their own constitution; and the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusets only provides that the Legislature of this Territory shall make this declaration. His section does not provide the people of that Territory shall vote on it. The very next Legislature may repeal it. This same Legislature may repeal it the next week after her members are admitted into Congress. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether that is not correct? If his amendment is adopted and Nebraska is admitted, I ask the gentleman whether in his opinion that same Legislature next week cannot repeal it? That does not put it into the constitution of the State of Nebraska.

It has been asked here if the Senate bill is adopted, if this declaration is adopted by Congress containing these terms and conditions extending the right of suffrage to all classes without distinction of color, what remedy has a man who is excluded from the right to vote? I answer, the same remedy every other man has who has a legal right to vote and who is excluded from the polls. Precisely. He may apply to the courts; he may bring suit for this wrongful exclusion. He may apply to the courts for a mandamus to compel the judges of election to take his vote if he has the legal right to vote. If the act of Congress gives him the right to vote it gives him all the rights which the constitution of the State would give for the purpose and all the remedies.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to know whether Congress has the right to impose and enforce a constitution upon a people.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Congress has the right to make such terms and conditions upon the people of a Territory. By the enabling acts Congress has passed from time to time we have imposed conditions upon the Territories. We have declared the principle upon which they shall frame their State governments. We have declared that they shall put into their constitutions such and such provisions. We may declare, and it has been declared over and over again, that the lands of the United States shall not be taxed for five years after their entry.

Mr. DAVIS. Perhaps the gentleman did not understand the point of one portion of my inquiry. It is, whether Congress has the right to impose or enforce these provisions.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no earthly doubt of it, no more than that we may enforce upon the people of a Territory, without their consent, a declaration in the act incorporating the Territory saying who shall vote, who shall be qualified to hold office, and who shall be elected to the territorial Legislature. Until that Territory becomes a State of this Union the power of Congress over it is sovereign. Nebraska is not a State until we have passed an act admitting her and she has assumed the powers and functions of a State. Now, we are talking about passing an act admitting her, and we are talking about imposing conditions upon her. Why, I ask, have we not a right to insert a provision like that?

Gentlemen ask if Congress should pass an act declaring suffrage shall be impartial in the Territory of Nebraska forever, could that people when they become a State deprive any portion of her people of the right of suffrage? No, sir; the act of Congress would govern until Congress repealed it. Neither the Territory nor State of Nebraska could repeal it.

It is sought by the amendment to impose upon the people of Nebraska just exactly what is sought to be imposed upon the people of other States. What is it? Why, sir, the Legislative Assembly of Nebraska has no more authority to bind the people of that State than Congress. The only vitality and power the Legislature gets is from an act of Congress. We give to the State its charter; we give to it all its powers. It can exercise no power except what Congress has given to it.

It seems to me that any other theory robs Congress and the Government of the United States of the sovereignty which it has over the people of a Territory; and therefore I repeat what I said in the outset, that I believe a provision in an act of Congress in regard to negro suffrage, such as is contained in the third section of this bill, will be more binding upon the people of that State than could a provision inserted in the constitution of that State when admitted. So, sir, I would rather have the bill as it came from the Senate than with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. HISE. Mr. Speaker, in arguing any great question it is always necessary that certain axiomatic truths, certain manifestly first principles, should be conceded by all reasonable men. One principle or truth of that description, permit me here to state briefly, is that the Constitution of the United States is a compact by which the States as members of the Federal Union agreed with one another to institute a Government, with certain definite powers and for certain specific purposes; that the Constitution of the United States is the supreme, fundamental, irrevocable law, and there is no functionary of Government that exists by virtue of it that has any authority to disregard its provisions. The Congress of the United States, the Executive, and all the officers of the Government are all bound to obey the Constitution; and whenever any of the departments or of the high public functionaries of the Government are guilty of an act of usurpation not authorized by the Constitution, or of an assumption of powers not granted by it, or violate it in any particular, they are guilty of perjury, corrupt and damnable perjury. The Constitution is above all the powers of government created by it, and it is in vain to make an argument upon any great constitutional question to a body who assume to set aside or disregard its provisions and limitations.

But, sir, upon the supposition that the Constitution is to be respected and obeyed, and that its violation entails upon the party violating it the crime of perjury, I appeal to this House upon the question whether it is a Government of limited powers and of State creation, or whether it is a Government of a mere majority, with its powers unlimited, except by the force of numbers, to carry any measure that they may think proper. If it is a limited Government then you are to find the power that you attempt to exercise in some of the grants contained in that instrument. But where is the grant of the power of the Congress of the United States to be found in the Constitution to control in a State or Territory or in this District or anywhere else the right of the inhabitants, who are to be governed by municipal or local laws, to discriminate as a matter of policy as to who shall exercise the elective franchise?

The object of republican government, and especially the great object of our system of governments, State and Federal, is to secure the advancement of civilization and political liberty and promote the progress of arts and sciences. So, then, as a mere question of expediency the States did not think proper to abandon to the Federal Government the great fundamental power of deciding for them the question of the right of suffrage. We know that the object of Government is security of life, liberty, and property, to promote the happiness and civilization of man as a moral and intellectual being, and it is indispensable to that end that property, virtue, and intelligence should be considered as altogether important in settling the question in any State of this Union as to who shall or shall not exercise the right of suffrage. But the majority of the members of this House assume the authority and power for Congress to impose upon all the States, especially those which have lately been in conflict with the northern States, and upon all the Territories that are to be formed into States and admitted into this Union, the obligation to allow a class of people within their limits to take the government into their control, whereby, instead of promoting and securing property, life, liberty, and civilization, they would throw them back into a condition of barbarism; they would Africanize some, if not all, of the southern States by giving to the preponderant negro population therein the power to control their local governments, thus defeating all the ends that are intended to be secured by the institution of governments, and which alone can justify the cost and burden of their maintenance.

Now, sir, upon what ground is this power claimed for this Congress? Where do they find the authority in the Constitution of the United States? They can nowhere in the Constitution find any provision that, by any, the most latitudinous, construction could authorize the assumption and exercise of this power; none whatever. The Constitution provides that the Representatives in this House shall be elected by that portion of the population of their respective States which is entitled under the State constitution and laws to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, thus conceding to the States the governmental power of controlling this subject and of prescribing who shall and who shall not vote, what classes may and what may not exercise the right of suffrage, and upon what conditions the right shall exist. This Congress now propose to force upon the people of the southern States as a condition precedent to their recognition as members of the Union, and upon the people of the Territories as a condition to their admission as States, a voting population which will impede their march toward civilization and to the attainment of all the great ends and objects of government, the security of life, liberty and property. The power is claimed here that the Congress of the United States have authority to impose upon the southern States a condition that the colored population of those States shall be placed upon terms of social and political equality with the balance of the people as a condition precedent to admission to their right of representation here as States of this Union. They can find no such power anywhere in the Constitution; but they claim it under the provision to the effect that the Federal Government shall guaranty to the States a republican form of government.

Now, sir, is it not astounding that in a House composed of so many intelligent and learned men as I find from the debates that this does, that party feeling and party fanaticism should so jaundice and control the minds of men as to induce them to assume as authority for what they seek to effect this constitutional provision, which, by its true construction, not only does not sanction, but prohibits the exercise of this power of instituting arbitrary governments over the people, and in effect binds and commands the United States to respect and uphold the republican governments of the States, and consequently denies to Congress the right to deprive them of representation or the right of self-government? The intention of that clause of the Constitution was to provide that if any attempt were made by any outside Power to overthrow a republican form of government in the States the Federal Government should guaranty the continued existence of those republican governments as they existed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. Sir, I was cut short by the operation of the rules when I last addressed the House, in the argument which I attempted to make upon the question of the right of the southern States to their full representation upon this floor, at the point where I was about to remark upon this provision of the Constitution and state my views of its true meaning and how it could only be applied. Under that clause you now assume the right and claim the authority, whenever a majority of the Congress of the United States may decide that there is some law or some provision of the constitution of a State, or some line of domestic policy which may be adopted by a State, in opposition to your party views, to say that the form of government of that State is not republican; and the majority of this body can, therefore, under this assumption, impose upon the people of a State a despotic government, without regard to the will of the people, and in which they are refused any representation, which is the very soul of a republic, and this under pretext of performing the constitutional duty of guarantying to the States a republican form of government.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, a great deal of argument may be saved upon this question by a simple statement of facts. The Territory of Nebraska has come here with a State constitution asking Congress to admit the Territory as one of the States of this Union. The fact cannot be denied that in asking this of Congress they ask it without possessing a population which, under the apportionment of 1860, would entitle them to one member of Congress. I admit, however, that that is not an argument against the proposed action of Congress, for Territories have been admitted as States when their population was much less than that required by the apportionment of Representatives; but they are here asking a concession at the hands of Congress such as has been the case in all other instances where Territories have been admitted with a less population than that required by the apportionment of Representatives in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, it is but a few days since the House voted upon this very question, and that, too, not upon a local bill, but upon a general law for the Territories of the Union, providing that the elective franchise shall not be restricted to the white male citizens of the Territories, but that restriction will be taken away by this bill if the House passes it and the President signs it and it becomes a law. This House stands to-day committed to that principle, from which it cannot go back, and to-day Nebraska is one of those Territories in regard to which this House is committed to that principle as much as it is in regard to any other Territory within the limits of the United States.

Pass this bill, with either the Senate provision or the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL], and, according to the argument of my friend from New York, [Mr. HALE], and also of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO], we restrict the elective franchise so far as the principle which we have declared by our votes on this floor is concerned.

Now, it is claimed that it is not entirely a stretch of power on our part, but it is such a use of it as is not sanctioned by good judgment and discretion, for us to attempt to dictate to Nebraska who shall vote or who shall not vote within her limits. Sir, let me call the attention of every member of this House to one thing: we have made some advance since the last session of Congress. At that session the Colorado bill came here from the Senate, and it passed this House with the same restrictions that were in the Nebraska bill before the third session was put upon it in the Senate. But we have progressed somewhat since that time. It is very doubtful from the indications given out by the present debate whether Colorado, Nebraska, or any other Territory which comes here with a constitution containing the word "white" can receive for its admission a majority of the votes upon this floor. During one year of time this body has made good progress.

Now, I would call the attention of this House to this point: while gentlemen are talking about the exercise of power here, I ask gentlemen in what direction is that power exercised? It is not exercised for the purpose of restricting the elective franchise, but of extending it. It is on the road to liberty and to right and to equal and impartial justice. And let no man on this side of the House get up here and pretend to argue this question of power, when it is exercised on that road and in that direction. No man can argue that question in sincerity and in integrity who is truly loyal to his country. I say that every step which we, as the national Legislature, take to extend impartial justice, impartial right, and impartial suffrage is a step in the right direction, and is the exercise of a power which we should exercise.

No member upon this floor will rise and tell us that we are obliged to admit one of these Territories as a State. It is within the discretion of this Congress whether it will or not admit any Territory as a State. When a Territory comes here and asks to be admitted as a State let it come here with clean hands and a pure heart, especially when it comes with a less population than is required to elect to this House a member from one of the States of this Union; let it come with impartial justice written upon its constitution, or let it keep away from these Halls. The people of Nebraska, and those here who urge us to vote for their admission as a State, ask us to take a step backward in our course for the sake of their own advancement for the time being. Now let our course be onward; and if the people of any Territory desire anything at our hands, let them fit themselves for the present condition of affairs in our country, and not ask us to go back upon our course.

At the last session of Congress we passed what is popularly known as the "civil rights bill," and it became a law. By that law every native-born person in this country, without regard to distinction of race or color, was declared to be a citizen of the United States. And yet it would seem that my friend from New York [Mr. HALE] is as much an old fogy as he was before the great rebellion through which we have just passed. I think he must have forgotten how many of the noble men of this nation have been buried beneath the sod during the struggle for the preservation of this Government, and how many billions our country is in debt from carrying on the war for the preservation of its existence and the liberties of its citizens.

Sir, it is said that the right to vote is a privilege which we enjoy. I did not know that it was simply a privilege which I enjoyed. If it is a privilege, then I would like to know who extended to me that privilege; I would like to know the origin of the power to extend it. It has been claimed that the people of the United States possess the sovereign power in this country; and if you make any distinction by reason of race or color, it is because might makes right, and on no other ground.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HIGBY. Certainly.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would inquire of the gentleman whether the enabling act for the admission of the Territory of Nebraska does not limit the right of suffrage to white persons, and whether if so we ought now to impose any condition upon that Territory which the enabling act does not impose?

Mr. HIGBY. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I do not so understand the enabling act. If the gentleman will examine that act closely I think he will find that it refers to the principles contained in the Declaration of Independence, which will give a very different phase to that question. I think those principles should be interpreted aright by this time; and if they are, then those who are governed are the persons to speak upon the question.

Mr. NIBLACK. Ought we now to give an interpretation to the principles of the Declaration of Independence, which we did not give to them when we passed that enabling act?

Mr. HIGBY. I understand that the interpretation given then was the same as that given now; I so interpreted it, and I presume others did upon this floor. If we have been giving the lie to the principles of the Declaration of Independence, then we better soon turn from the error of our ways. I think the great difficulty under which the country has been laboring for the last six years grew out of a wrong application of the principles entertained in the Declaration of Independence.

Sir, the simple question here is whether we will, by adopting the amendment which is now under consideration, require Nebraska to give impartial suffrage to all her citizens, or whether, by rejecting that amendment, we will allow her to be admitted into the Union without impartial suffrage. And that is the question to be decided by our vote upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL].

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. I attempted to get the floor before the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HISS], for the purpose of responding briefly to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO], because it seemed to me that they were entirely mistaken in their facts. The gentleman from Ohio asked whether we dare do certain things. Mr. Speaker, I dare do whatever I believe to be right; and I dare do right, though my action may not accord with what I have done in the past, either because I was not then sufficiently enlightened, or because I have struggled for the point would have been to struggle palpably against fate.

The gentleman from Ohio says we voted to admit Tennessee with a constitution disfranchising her colored citizens. I say to him—

"Never shake thy gory locks at me;
Thou canst not say I did it."

I am, sir, one of twelve who saw that the members of this House were by that act establishing a precedent that must embarrass and might control them for evil in the future. Few though we were, we tried to save the gentleman from Ohio and those who yielded to his persuasive eloquence from the dilemma in which they were placing themselves, and Tennessee made no precedent for us.

We have before us the establishment of governments for an empire grander in extent and national wealth than any on earth save Russia. In legislating for Tennessee we forgot the lawyer's maxim, that "good cases make bad precedents," and did what now comes back to plague us. But I implore gentlemen not to strengthen that precedent by adding the case of Nebraska to that of Tennessee and that of Colorado to Nebraska, so that the southern people when they come with constitutions excluding races from the rights of citizenship may well charge us with acting invidiously if we hold them to the standard we profess to have established.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] said that if the idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] of a republican form of government was correct, then there never had been outside of the New England States, and there but one or two States, which had republican forms of government. Sir, he has not read the history of his country or he would not have made that assertion. When the Constitution of the United States was adopted, every State that entered the Union, except South Carolina, was republican in form and was republican in the respect considered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL]. South Carolina was the only State which by its primitive constitution debarred men from their right of suffrage by reason of race or color or previous condition.

And the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] turned to me and asked whether, while Pennsylvania denies the right to forty thousand of her citizens, I dare insist upon requiring new States to concede it to men as dark as they. As I have said, I dare insist upon doing whatever seems to me to be right, but dare not do that which is palpably wrong; more than that, sir, I dare not pile wrong upon wrong. Because I cannot persuade the people of my native State to do right, or because we have bound ourselves by constitutional limitations, unchangeable for a series of years, to maintain oppression, I will not consent to establish wrong in Nebraska. No, sir, I dare not plead a great wrong which I cannot repair as my justification for perpetrating an injustice I can avert.

Every free man in the Territory of Nebraska has by act of Congress the right of suffrage; I believe I am right in that. But it is sneeringly said that there are only some eight or nine hundred colored men there. Sir, to-day those eight or nine hundred colored men are free American citizens, enjoying the right of suffrage in common with their fellow-citizens of the Territory. And I will not consent, and I beg gentlemen on this side of the House to bear in mind the fact that they are asked by their vote to-day to do so, to degrade those eight or nine hundred men and deprive them of the rights secured to them by ourselves by an act of last session. Let the chivalry of the South in their humiliation and madness strive to degrade freemen if they will, but in God's name do not let the Republican majority of the Thirty-Ninth Congress put shackles upon the limbs and souls of nine hundred of the free citizens of Nebraska.

Gentlemen ask of us, Have we the right to regulate the question of suffrage in States? Sir, I will not discuss the question now. I examined it elaborately last session. I will remind gentlemen that I do but request them to stem a downward tide.

When the Constitution was adopted, as I have said, all save one State were republican in this respect. Slowly one after another their constitutions were modified as concessions to the slave power. Connecticut in 1817 and 1818, Maryland at a later day, Tennessee not till 1885, Pennsylvania in 1837, struck down the free voters of African descent in their States. And I again implore the Republican members of this Congress not to follow those base examples, but to stand upon their own position and justify the just expectations of the people by saying that what was republican at the time of the adoption of the Constitution shall be our standard. Let us do right though we thereby keep the less than proper congressional constituency—for the whole people of Nebraska number far less than your constituents, Mr. Speaker, or mine—in a territorial condition, until they shall concede to every American citizen within the limits of their broad, rich, grand, though infant empire the rights which under the Constitution of the United States, as understood by its framers, pertain to every citizen.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HILL obtained the floor, and yielded five minutes of his time to

Mr. ALLISON, who said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to make any direct argument bearing upon the particular question now before the House, but only to state briefly why I am for the amendment. The State in which I live lies adjacent to the Territory which is now asking for admission as a State into the Union, separated from it only by the Missouri river, and I shall be glad to cast my vote in favor of its admission here if that Territory or State stands ready to incorporate within its organic law a principle which I believe to be the duty of every State to incorporate, whether now in the Union or hereafter to be admitted, which principle is clearly set forth in the amendment now under consideration.

The State of Iowa, which I in part represent, by the vote of her people and by a majority of more than twenty thousand has declared that the word "white" should be stricken from her constitution; and that question is again to be submitted to the people of my own State next year. And I intend if I am present the day of the election to cast my vote in favor of striking out that word from the constitution of the State, depriving, as it does, a portion of her people of the right to participate in the enactment of laws for their government.

I intend further, sir, to cast my vote only in favor of the admission of such of the ten States which have been declared in rebellion as will adopt an impartial rule of suffrage, without distinction of race or color. I shall not cast my vote for their admission until they are willing to accord to the black man the rights which white men enjoy under similar circumstances. Therefore it is, sir, that unless this proposition now made by the gentleman from Massachusetts is incorporated into this bill as a fundamental condition-precedent to the admission of this State into the Union, much as I desire its admission, I shall be compelled to vote against it.

I believe it is within the power of Congress to impose a condition-precedent upon a Territory, and that condition, when assented to by the Legislature of the State as is here proposed, which Legislature represents for the time being the sovereignty of the people, is binding upon the people of the State; and I join hands with the distinguished member from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and say I will not put by my vote gyves upon the wrists of nine hundred freemen in Nebraska, especially when probably more than one half of them imperiled their lives in defense of the liberties which we now enjoy, and which they as citizens have a right to enjoy in common with us. More especially should we insist upon this amendment when by the votes of both Houses we have recently declared by a large majority that in all the Territories, including Nebraska, in the future, there shall be no distinction of rights on account of race or color or previous condition of servitude; and when we insist that similar provisions shall apply to the States recently in rebellion, to consent now to a surrender of these rights virtually acquired, either directly or indirectly, would in my judgment be a disgraceful abandonment of a principle which I believe just, and which meets the approval of a vast majority of the people of this nation. For myself, I cannot by my voice or vote consent to such abandonment. I shall therefore vote for the amendment, and for the admission of the State with the limitations prescribed. I thank the gentleman from Indiana for his courtesy in yielding to me.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California referred to the progress which has been made by this House on this subject of legislation. I will allude for a moment to a matter perhaps personal to myself. The gentleman from California remarked that we had recently passed a law through this House that the word "white" should not appear in any law of any Territory, and that no rights and privileges should be given to the whites not extended equally to the blacks; and he spoke of it as a matter of congratulation that we had made that progress. Well, sir, as that appeals perhaps personally to me in regard to certain votes that I have given in this House, I cheerfully embrace the opportunity to say a word on the subject.

When the act regulating suffrage in the District of Columbia was before the House one year ago I voted against it. I did so for reasons that seemed to me amply sufficient at the time, and I have had no reason to doubt the validity and cogency of those reasons since. At that time matters of the weightiest importance were before this Congress. No rupture then existed between the President and Congress; but it was foreseen by many that such a rupture was imminent, and the question was whether it should be precipitated or aggravated, and whether the condition of the country would be more embarrassed by shouldering a question of that character at that time than by avoiding it. It seemed to me the part of wisdom and prudence to settle the questions then before the House regarding reconstruction—questions of the utmost importance not merely to the States unrepresented but to the country at large. For that reason I voted against the extension of the right of suffrage to the colored people of this District. But that reason has now ceased to exist. A policy has been adopted by Congress in regard to reconstruction. We have now time in which to educate the public mind upon this subject, and consequently being more at liberty to exercise and assert the principles more nearly approaching abstract right—for it is never practicable to assert it absolutely—I voted this year directly contrary to what I voted a year ago; because the reasons that operated then to control my vote do not operate now. So much in explanation of my progress upon this subject.

And now, in regard to the measure immediately before this House. The section that is proposed to be stricken out is a condition-subsequent upon the admission of this State. I am satisfied that a large majority of the House are of opinion that no valid condition can be imposed upon a State seeking admission by act of Congress which would be binding upon the people of the State thereafter. I think that was sufficiently shown yesterday, and I confess to some surprise when I heard gentlemen of high standing as lawyers advance the opinion that conditions might be imposed upon the admission of the State which Congress or the Government would have the power to enforce upon the people of a State after admission. Why, sir, is it to be contended on this floor that when a State is once admitted with its representation here and becomes a part of the family of States it is not to be permitted to regulate its own affairs within its own limits equally with every other State? Is that the equality of States which is recognized upon this floor? Sir, that is not in accordance with our theory of Government; it is in direct violation of all its traditions from its formation down to the present time. The theory which we have always adopted is that when a State is once admitted into the Union it has the same rights as every other State, and no act of Congress in the admission can control the future action of the State.

The Ordinance of 1787 was referred to by the gentleman from Illinois as having been held valid by the Supreme Court, so that no State could ever authorize the existence of slavery after that prohibition. Now, with all deference to the gentleman's opinion, I insist that no case has ever arisen or could arise where that decision could be formed. It is a mere obiter dictum. No State formed out of that Territory has ever undertaken to establish slavery; hence any opinion of the Supreme Court would be a mere opinion of good lawyers but no decision, and therefore not entitled to any weight as authority in this House, even if any opinion of the Supreme Court, which I deny, is entitled to weight as binding authority here. The Congress of the United States decides questions for itself; the decisions of the Supreme Court are only binding upon the parties immediately before it and the judiciary as precedents, and in regard to matters immediately involved in the particular decision made.

But the theory of the Government has been that every State in the Union must regulate this matter of suffrage for itself. Massachusetts prohibits those from voting who cannot read. Indiana permits a man to vote who has been a resident of the United States one year and a resident of the State six months preceding the day of election, and who has declared his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States. Other States attach other conditions. Now, sir, I insist that in the light of all these facts, of all the practice of the Government from its foundation down to the present time, it is impracticable to impose any conditions which shall be valid after the State shall be admitted into the Union.

Now, it is proposed to change this condition-subsequent to a condition-precedent by sending the whole question back to the Legislature of Nebraska for future action, which is in fact, in all probability, throwing it beyond the present Congress.

It has been desired to have immediate action; it is desirable that this State shall be admitted, and for that reason this House has disregarded its own enabling act, an act passed by the House and by the Senate after solemn consideration, and has passed an act admitting this State notwithstanding it had a provision in its Constitution which the most strenuous advocates of negro suffrage insist is not in accordance with the principles of the Declaration of Independence, while the enabling act required that its constitution should be in accordance with those principles, yet the House passed that act and it went to the Senate and from that body now comes this bill upon which we are called upon to act. By adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] we accomplish nothing. We only require an action of the State Legislature which may be repealed the day after it is enacted, and for that single object it proposes to send the whole matter back to the territorial Legislature and thus postpone it indefinitely, because if it goes over beyond this session of Congress the whole subject drops and must be taken up de novo; if by delay this Congress fails to act the whole matter must be originated anew in the next Congress.

Now, I am unwilling to incur the delay that would necessarily result from action of the character proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, when I can discover no practical good that would be accomplished. I prefer the bill in the shape in which it originally came from the Senate, not because I think the provision contained in the third section more effective than the amendment proposed, for I have already attempted to show that it has no binding validity whatever, but because by all the proposed action and delay still nothing would be accomplished.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen have asked exultingly if anybody denies that this is a Republic, and that the States are republics. Sir, anything is a republic which you choose to call a republic. Rome was a republic under her worst consuls and emperors. They called it so. There have been republics everywhere in the midst of despotism. You may call what you choose a republic. What I am to speak to now is the Republic intended by the Declaration of Independence, and I deny that this Government has ever been such a republic; I deny that the State of Pennsylvania, to which reference was made, is a republic; and that is an answer to the gentleman; I wish this Congress would take it in hand and make it a republic.

Now, what was the Republic contemplated by the Declaration of Independence? "All men are created free and equal" and "all rightful government is founded on the consent of the governed." Nothing short of that is the Republic intended by the Declaration. But we are now attempting to build a perfect Republic. We are now attempting to finish a structure whose foundations were laid nearly a century ago. That structure is the temple of liberty, where all nations may worship. Men who, if ever there were demi-gods deserved that name, suddenly appeared on the scene of political action—the Adamases, Thomas Jefferson, and their compeers, and created an epoch in the science of government. Rejecting the old doctrine of hereditary succession and the divine right of kings, they boldly proclaimed the equality of the human race, and asserted that the right of all government was founded on the consent of the governed. Upon this Declaration alone stood the American Revolution. The people then had no actual grievance which would justify the shedding of one drop of human blood.

But they fought and bled for this sublime idea. In this sign they conquered. But when peace and security had come, and the several sovereignties attempted to "form a more perfect Union," they found themselves obstructed by a pernicious and unyielding institution in direct hostility to their avowed principles, and they were obliged to trust to time to eradicate it. They left the foundation firm, beautiful, and imperishable, and waited for the arrival of this propitious period to complete the superstructure. What a glorious sight it were to look in upon this Hall and see those great men revived, rejuvenated—occupying their seats and finishing their imperfect work, proclaiming universal liberty and equality to the human race! But that may not be. They have left this scene of action, as we soon shall, never to return. They enjoined upon their posterity to complete their labor. Are we that posterity or are we bastards? Are we the legitimate descendants of the men of the Revolution, or did some untutored horde of the dark ages break in and corrupt the progeny? If we fail to complete this superstructure in harmony with the foundation, we must be dwarfs in intellect or in moral courage.

Gentlemen loudly ask is not this a Republic? I measure it by the Declaration of Independence, as I did twenty years ago in this Hall when I denounced it as a despotism. Call you that a free Republic where there are twenty million rulers and four million slaves—human beings without one human right?

South Carolina has two hundred thousand whites and four hundred thousand men of color. Both are men; both have immortal souls. The two hundred thousand absolutely rule the four hundred thousand. They have no voice in anything connected with the government which rules them. Is this a Government deriving its force from the consent of the governed? Shame upon American statesmen, who in this day of their power hold such vile doctrine! Do not delay, give us now the Republic of the Declaration of Independence, and let the world behold and admire.

I would like to add a few things more, but am not well enough.

Mr. RAYMOND. I believe the question immediately before the House is upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to the third section of the bill as it came to us from the Senate. I am inclined to vote for that amendment for this simple reason, that it makes clear and explicit the purpose which the third section of the bill leaves very vague and uncertain.

The third section professes to make provision for extending all civil and political rights to all races and conditions of men in Nebraska as the fundamental and imperative condition of the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union. But gentlemen on this floor do not agree whether the section accomplishes that object or not; the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] says he will vote for this bill, because he regards that third section as utterly null and void; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] says he will vote for the bill because he regards that third section as full and effective; and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] says he shall feel constrained to vote against the bill, because that third section as it stands can have no binding effect whatever.

Now, when I vote I would like to know for what I am voting. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is clear, distinct, precise, and effective. It provides that this act shall take effect when, and only when, the Legislature of Nebraska shall have fulfilled the conditions imposed upon the State by the amendment; then by proclamation of the President, and without any further action by Congress, Nebraska is to be admitted as a State into this Union.

And I will take occasion to say that I am moreover in favor of the main provision under debate here, the extension, whenever it can be done by competent authority, of equal rights to all races and conditions of men. I do not believe there is any shadow of reason why the right of suffrage, as well as all civil rights, all personal rights, all rights pertaining to or enjoyable under a republican Government, should be extended to one class of men and denied to another because of a difference in their color, their condition, or their race. The only pretense of a reason that ever existed for any such discrimination grew out of the institution of slavery, out of the fact that one race as a race was held in abject submission, and was not civilly, personally, socially, or in any other way the equal of the race that ruled the land. But with slavery perished the last shadow of reason for any such discrimination. I have, therefore, never neglected any opportunity to vote to make, wherever this Government had the power so to do, the civil and political rights of the colored man equal to the rights of all other men. And the question whether suffrage be or be not a natural and inalienable right or the gift of the Government has not ing to do with my opinion on this point. If suffrage be a natural right, then the colored man, equally with the white man, should be allowed to enjoy it. If it be only a privilege resting upon considerations of policy, then good policy requires its extension to him as well as to men of other races. I hold that whether it be an inalienable right or simply a matter of policy, it nevertheless is true, as a general principle in every republican Government, that all who are required to obey the laws should have a voice, directly or indirectly, in making those laws.

I shall therefore vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL], though not for the reasons nor on the grounds assigned by him; nor do I mean to say that I shall vote for the bill whether it shall or shall not have been thus amended. That question I shall reserve for further consideration. There are many other questions entering into its decision beside the question of suffrage. There is a great question, a question of paramount interest to me and to the State which I in part represent, which I cannot help considering: the question whether it is just and wise and politic to allow the great States of the Union, such as New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, the old, populous, and powerful States, to be overborne, year after year, in one branch of the Legislature of the nation by States whose population is not sufficient to entitle them to a single member upon this floor. I do not think it good policy; I think it unwise, unjust, and if pushed to the extreme to which it seems likely to be pushed, calculated to work fundamental and most important changes in the whole structure of the Government. Why, sir, we all know that sometimes in England when the ministry finds it necessary to have additional votes to pass some favorite measure they add to the peerage by creating peers for the purpose, so that the vote under their control in the House of Lords may be made sufficient for the purpose. Sir, this creation of new States is liable to the same abuse, if it has not already been subjected to it.

Then again, as to the power of Congress over the constitutions of new States that are coming in, that is a very grave question which I think has not been at all settled by the discussions which have been had upon it. Gentlemen on this floor maintain the right of Congress not only to prescribe conditions of admission, but actually to create constitutions for the States to be admitted; and yet they claim this power under the pretense—for it can be nothing more—that it rests on that clause of the Constitution which declares that the United States shall guaranty to those States a republican form of government. Now, I shall not enter into the discussion of what is or is not a republican form of government; but certainly it seems to me clear that the assent of the people, the action of the people, the will of the people to be governed, should enter, in a more or less restricted form, into the creation of the fundamental law by which that people are to be governed if it is to be a republican form of government. Now, if we here in Congress dictate a constitution for the State of Nebraska and force it upon the people of that State; can we call that a republican form of government? We prescribe a constitution, a fundamental law, to the people of Nebraska, and then because they accept the terms which we impose we say they have a republican form of government.

Now, sir, I cannot quite assent to what have been stated as historical facts by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I did not know that Rome was called a republic under Nero or under Trajan. It may be that any government which we call a republic is a republic; but on no other ground certainly can we consider the government of Nebraska a republican form of government, if she comes in under a constitution which we dictate to and impose upon her. I, however, honor the gentleman from Pennsylvania to-day, as I have had occasion to do many times before, for the courage with which he follows his principles to their legitimate conclusion, however startling and extraordinary that conclusion may be. He has declared here that the government of Pennsylvania is not a republican form of government, and he has expressed the hope that Congress will make it such. I do not know, sir, whether he would go quite as far as the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] did yesterday, and claim that Congress has the power to prescribe conditions of admission, to prescribe terms which shall make proposed State governments republican in form, and then, if the States concerned do not assent to those terms, or afterward violate them, that we have power to march armies into their midst and compel them to submit to and adopt the government which we impose. That seems to me to be extending the principle asserted on this floor to a somewhat dangerous extent, though I confess it seems to me a logical inference from the principles which are asserted in this bill and by gentlemen upon this floor.

I have sometimes feared that gentlemen of this House, in their anxiety to secure republican forms of government to the States, might entirely forget the necessity, or even the propriety, of maintaining a republican form of government for the United States. Certainly a Government which is to march armies into the States to compel assent to its will can scarcely be called a republican form of government. It may be a democratic despotism, a centralized despotism under democratic forms, as the Government of France is; but it is not, and no ingenuity, no sophistry, can make it even seem to be, the Republic which our fathers founded and handed down to their posterity to be preserved forever. Nor do I think that the clause of the Constitution which imposes on the Government of the United States the duty of guarantying to each State a republican form of government obliges or authorizes the Federal Government to make for each State what at any time its shifting parties may be pleased to call a republican form of government. We "guaranty" to a man or a State or community that which that man or State or community has already in possession. If we guaranty to a man possession of his house, we do not oblige ourselves to put him into a house, to erect and provide a house for him, and keep him there against his will. If we guaranty the payment of a note, we presume that note to be already in existence. The Government of the United States guaranties to each State what that State adopts and accepts, acting under the Constitution of the United States and in obedience to its restrictions, as a republican form of government. And it is rather startling to hear, as we have heard upon this floor to-day, that, with one or two exceptions, there are no States in this Union having republican forms of government, such as the United States are bound by the Constitution to guaranty to every State in the Union; and it is still more startling to hear the power of the Government invoked to make all those States—old and new, Pennsylvania and Ohio as well as Nebraska and South Carolina—republican in form by an arbitrary exercise of its will, backed by its armed power.

I think it desirable that new States should come into this Union as soon as they are properly organized, as soon as their population is sufficient to entitle them to representation upon this floor. They are guarantied full representation at the other end of the Capitol the moment they come in. I do not think there is any reason, either in right or good policy, why we should have States here simply because they have some population and desire to come in. There are many advantages in being a State undoubtedly, advantages to the State itself and advantages to the Government of which they form a part; but I think we should not act with undue haste in these matters. If these States have elements of growth in them they can afford to wait a few years until their population is sufficient at least to entitle them to one member here. Until they have at least population enough for that I do not think we are bound by any consideration of duty or of sound public policy to admit them on equal terms with New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio as States into the Union.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will vote for this amendment, and if it should be adopted by the House I will vote for the passage of this bill; but without this amendment I will not vote for the passage of the bill. For, sir, I have firmly resolved never to vote for the admission of any State into this Union which embodies within its constitution the objectionable proposition to be found in the one presented by the people of Nebraska. The time has gone by for us to recognize that distinction of rights because of the question of the color of the skin or of race or of birth. And I hope, sir, it may never receive any recognition at the hands of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I will not enter upon the discussion of the question which has been propounded by several gentlemen as to whether the State of Pennsylvania, Ohio, or Iowa possesses a republican form of government. The limitation which is found in the constitution of Nebraska is found in the constitution of Iowa to-day; but, sir, I hope before many months have passed we will have stricken that limitation out of our constitution. I have full confidence that the people mean to do it.

Now, as to the effect of this amendment; will it be binding? Will it effect anything? Can the people of Nebraska after its admission as a State remove this obligation resting upon them and reincorporate into their constitution this limitation. If my time will allow me I will endeavor to answer this question. Gentlemen in this discussion seem to forget that the Legislature of a State may do that which it is not restricted from doing; that the Legislature of a State is not bound by the same rules of constitutional law as the Congress of the United States; that unless an act is prohibited by the Constitution a State Legislature can do it. The Congress of the United States may do such acts as its delegated powers authorize, and such as are necessary to the enjoyment of the powers thus delegated; that is, exercise implied powers incidental and necessary to those delegated. The Legislature of a State is not bound by the constitutional law applicable to this body. Can, then, the Legislature of Nebraska assent to the proposition embraced in this amendment? Gentlemen will say no. Why? Because it is not the Legislature of the State. Admit it. We send this proposition to a body of men known to the constitution which has been sent to us here as the constitution of Nebraska, as the Legislature of the State of Nebraska. They are bound by the authority of the amendment it is proposed to be incorporated into this bill. They pass upon this proposition, and in the name and in behalf of the people of Nebraska they accept this proposition. It may be said their power is not sufficiently extensive to warrant this.

They are the agents chosen by the people of the Territory asking for admission as a State. After the acceptance of the condition by this body of men thus authorized to act for the people within the bounds of their Constitution, the people of the new State act upon the condition themselves and accept and ratify the action of the Legislature. Now, sir, if they consent to act in their capacity of a State organization upon the condition thus accepted by their legislative body, I insist that they ratify that action of their Legislature, and it becomes binding upon the people. If they do not accept it, then they do not appear here in the person of Representatives as a State of the Union; they remain just where they are; they acquire no status in the Union as a member of it. If, on the other hand, as I have remarked, they by accepting the position of a State in the Union ratify the action of the body called the State Legislature, it becomes binding upon them.

Now, if this be true, then this proposition will be effective and will reach and accomplish the object we so much desire.

But it is said, even if this should be binding upon the people of Nebraska after admission, that after they have been clothed with the power of a State they may at once amend the constitution and reinsert this limited right of suffrage. I deny it. The idea that a people of a Territory may apply to Congress for admission as a State, promising all that the Government of the United States and the people of the United States ask them to perform, promising for the purpose of deceiving the Government of the United States after their promise has been accepted by the Congress of the United States, and the State is admitted into the family of States, the doctrine that they can the next day repudiate all and reverse the principles of this constitution, I deny. Why, sir, to establish a doctrine of that kind is but to place within the power of the people of any Territory the means to contravene a most solemn act of the Government of the United States in the admission of a State.

Now, sir, I have a theory of my own—I know not how many may be willing to indorse it—in regard to these changes of State constitutions. The Government of the United States is required by the Constitution to guaranty a republican form of government to the several States of the Union. The people of a Territory present a constitution which Congress declares to be republican in form, and to conform to the requirements exacted by Congress. Now, my doctrine in regard to these constitutions is that changes which the people may subsequently seek to make in them should be submitted to Congress the same as the original constitution is submitted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I mean to stand by the bill as it came from the Senate for the reasons which I assigned yesterday, and I mean to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] I shall do so for the reason that the proposition is without precedent in the history of the Government. I am not to be alarmed by gentlemen assuming on this floor to be the sole champions and defenders of liberty, and I scout all pretension of gentlemen who profess to be such champions and come into this House to trample the charter of liberty and the oath which they have taken under their feet.

What is proposed by this amendment? It is this: that the Legislature of a State shall change its organic law in direct contravention of the express authority of the people of that State, and only by authority of Congress. Who ever before heard such a proposition? It has no parallel in the Missouri case; and to test the vitality of this, I will agree to vote for the proposition in the case of Missouri word for word, letter for letter, as a substitute for this clause. It does not approach the Missouri proposition, which was that the State of Missouri should be admitted into the Union upon the fundamental condition that her constitution should never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and no law should ever be passed by the State of Missouri in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States of the Union should be excluded from the enjoyment of any privileges or immunities to which such citizen was entitled under the Constitution of the United States.

But what is this proposition? Why, that the Legislature of the State of Nebraska shall change its organic law so that that clause shall be what it was not made by that people but the very contrary thereof. What right has Congress to make a constitution for a State? The people make the constitutions of States, and the people made the Constitution of the United States. The first line of that great instrument is, "We, the people of the United States, do ordain and establish this Constitution." The first article in that Constitution is, that the people of a State shall control its organic power and define the qualifications of its electors. What is this proposition? That Congress by the legislative enactment of the State shall change its organic law so as to fix for all time to come the qualifications of electors.

Sir, I will gladly hail the day when every State in this Union shall strike the word "white" from its constitution, but I will not stultify myself by pretending that we can guaranty to Nebraska a republican government in violation of the very letter of the constitution which that people have ordained, and at the same time refuse to guaranty a like republican government to Pennsylvania or Ohio in defiance of the will of the people of those States. Our power to do the one is equal to our power to do the other.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the bill which came to us from the Senate was not such a one as I could approve, and therefore I made no speech in its favor, intending simply to vote for it and trust, as my friend said yesterday, that the moral power which the third section carried with it would give us a majority in the two new States.

I now rise to say that I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] and to advise all the members of the House who are in favor of the passage of the bill to sustain that amendment, in order that we may stand as a unit in favor of the admission of these new States. I am satisfied that the adoption of this amendment will secure the early admission of Nebraska, and with that I am content.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] I desire to say that I think he is in error as to the proceedings of Congress in reference to the admission of Missouri. As I understand the matter, the constitution of Missouri contained a provision that the State might pass a law by which free negroes should be excluded from the State, and Congress declared that that provision in their constitution should never be so interpreted as to authorize the exclusion of free negroes from that State, requiring the Legislature of the State of Missouri to accept that as a fundamental condition upon which Missouri was to be admitted into the Union. That is my recollection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have the statute here, and there is no such thing in it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot now yield to the gentleman. That is my recollection.

But, sir, to come to the practical question before the House, I may say, without going into any explanation of what must be apparent to every gentleman upon the floor, that the proposition which I submit offers the only practicable way by which Nebraska can be admitted into the Union at the present time.

In the first place, that proposition secures all that is secured by the bill as it came from the Senate—the judgment of Congress as to what should be the law of Nebraska in reference to the elective franchise. It further secures this, which is of paramount importance, and which I submit is all that can ever be secured by the Congress of the United States in reference to any State: the moral consent and judgment of the people of Nebraska that the provision of their constitution to which we object shall never be enforced in that State. It is to be presumed that the Legislature of Nebraska, the last Assembly elected by the people there, understand the wishes and opinions of the people in reference to this matter. We submit this proposition to that Legislature. They are presumed to represent the will and opinions of the people of the State. If they assent to this proposition we have then, in behalf of the position we maintain here, the political force of the political opinion of the representatives of the people of Nebraska and the moral power of the people of that State, they, through their representatives, having assented to this proposition as a fundamental condition under which they take their place in the Government of this country; and we may safely rely upon the people of Nebraska for all time to come to make good the obligation which they will have assumed through their Legislature to the people and the Government of this country. Moreover we inaugurate that State upon a right principle. If a change be made hereafter the moving party will be a party in the wrong, and the right will be in possession of the fortress, of the stronghold of republican principles in that State.

I do not desire to say anything further myself, but the gentleman from New York from the Troy district, [Mr. GRISWOLD,] appealed to me a few moments since for two or three minutes of my time, and I now yield to him.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I am much obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has charge of this bill, for the very brief opportunity he has afforded me for explaining the vote I propose to give.

I have always contended, Mr. Speaker, that the true theory of our Government demanded that the whole people should have the right of participating in that Government; that all who are to be the subjects of our laws should have a voice in the making of those laws. To this must the question of suffrage ultimately come. I have always been opposed to the modern distinction which has been made on account of color, and have voted whenever the opportunity has presented in accordance with this opposition. In my own State and in the District of Columbia my vote has been given to abrogate this color-distinction. Especially now that the chief cause of this distinction has been eradicated in the abolition of the institution of slavery, it is in my judgment quite time that our legislation should conform to the changed condition of things.

In the present case, Mr. Speaker, my great embarrassment has been that it seems to be breaking down the barriers which I believe in observing and respecting, that of leaving the control of the question of suffrage with the States themselves. But, sir, I justify myself on this point in the fact that we are now legislating for a Territory over which no State government exists; and I can see no impropriety or inconsistency, especially in the changed condition of our national affairs, in the Congress of the United States prescribing conditions under which new States shall be admitted to a participation in the legislation of the country. I do not forget in this connection that the State government when organized will have the power to repudiate these conditions and make such as they may see fit; but the moral force of a congressional expression cannot but have more or less effect, and the greater when that expression is on the side of humanity, right, and justice.

Influenced thus, Mr. Speaker, by the varied and somewhat conflicting considerations that have weight in deciding on the question under consideration, I have come to the conclusion to record my vote first for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] and then for the bill as amended.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I take it for granted, Mr. Speaker, that no intelligent, liberal-minded man, who has watched the remarkable progress of events, and the still more remarkable progress of ideas in this country during the last few years, can fail to see that the sentiment and purpose of the American people are rapidly and inevitably centering upon this great truth, to be applied to every citizen of lawful age unconvicted of crime, namely: suffrage and safety, like liberty and union, "are one and inseparable." For myself, I was long ago committed to this truth; and to-day more firmly than ever before I believe that by this alone can we deserve or enjoy perfect or lasting peace. This truth I will not sacrifice for consideration of expediency or political advantage. Hence, when I am called upon to give my consent to the admission of any new State into this Union I demand that this shall be one of the fundamental conditions.

Whether the amendment now pending before the House does legally affix that condition may be a question of doubt; but that it calls out from the highest legislative authority of Nebraska a declaration to that effect and morally commits the new State to the proposition, binding its people in a covenant with the nation which they will not break, is to my mind clear beyond question. The bill as it came from the Senate was only a declaration of the will of Congress: that the new State should give equal rights to all its citizens. The pending amendment allows the State to come in only when she shall give her solemn pledge that such rights shall be guaranteed. Believing that Nebraska will keep her faith, I shall vote for this bill if the amendment prevails.

One word more. I cannot agree with my colleague, [Mr. DELANO.] He says that we stultify ourselves if we declare that a State shall not come into the Union with a constitution which gives the suffrage only to white men, because we have never made that condition before, and the word "white" is in many of our State constitutions. I answer him that if we adopt that doctrine we can never make any reform; and I answer him further that I hope and believe—and I think he will agree with me in the opinion—that before the next twelve months shall have passed the State of Ohio will strike the word "white" from her constitution.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, the single minute remaining before the debate on this bill must be closed will permit me to say only that, independently of any other considerations which might incline me to oppose its passage, I am constrained to vote against the admission of Nebraska as I shall vote against the admission of Colorado, because neither has a population sufficient to entitle it to a single Representative in Congress.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon the amendment of Mr. BOUTWELL.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the third section in the following words: And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason of race or color, (excepting Indians not taxed.) And insert in lieu thereof the following:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act, upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the territorial government within thirty days after the passage of this act, to act upon the condition submitted herein.

Mr. HISE. Is not the question on this amendment divisible, so that we can have a separate vote on striking out the third section?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One of the rules of the House expressly declares that a motion to strike out and insert shall not be divisible.

Mr. THAYER. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 87, nays 70, not voting 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McRuer, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Stevens, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Williams, and Windom—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Benjamin, Bergen, Bingham, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Campbell, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Deffrees, Delano, Denison, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Henderson, Hill, Hise, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Kerr, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Leftwich, Marshall, McKee, Miller, Niblack, Nicholson, Plants, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Stokes, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Andrew H. Ward, Henry D. Washburn, and Whaley—70.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Barker, Beaman, Bidwell, Blow, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Darling, Dumont, Eggleston, Harris, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jones, Kasson, Laffin, William Lawrence, Marston, McCullough, Myers, Noell, Phelps, Pomeroy, Ross, Rousseau, Sloan, Starr, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—34.

So the amendment was adopted.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. MORRILL. My colleague, Mr. Woodbridge, is confined to his room by illness.

Mr. GRINNELL. My colleague, Mr. Hubbard, of Iowa, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. HOGAN. My colleague, Mr. Noell, is confined to his room by illness.

Mr. O'NEILL. My colleague, Mr. Myers, is absent attending to business of a committee. If he were present he would vote for this amendment.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I desire to announce that Mr. Clarke, of Kansas, is necessarily absent. If he were present he would vote for this amendment.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 55, not voting 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Dawes, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Ketcham, Koontz, George V. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Stokes, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baker, Bergen, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Deffrees, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C.

Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Kelso, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, Leftwich, Marshall, McKee, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, Andrew H. Ward, and Whaley—55.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Barker, Beaman, Bidwell, Blow, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Darling, Dumont, Eggleston, Harris, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jones, Kasson, Laffin, William Lawrence, McCullough, Myers, Noell, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Rousseau, Sloan, Starr, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—33.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague, Mr. Kasson, has been necessarily called away this morning. If he were here he would have voted in the affirmative on the amendment and on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. Beaman, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. STOKES. I am authorized to state that my colleague, Mr. Arnell, if present, would vote for the passage of this bill.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I now move, by unanimous consent, to take up and consider Senate bill No. 462, to admit the State of Colorado.

There was no objection.

The bill was read. The preamble recites that on the 21st day of March, 1864, Congress passed an act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and offered to admit the State, when so formed, into the Union upon compliance with certain conditions therein specified; that it appears by a message of the President of the United States that the people have adopted a constitution, which upon due examination is found to conform to the provisions and comply with the conditions of the enabling act, and to be republican in its form of government, and that they now ask for admission into the Union.

The first section provides that the constitution and State government which the people of Colorado have formed for themselves be accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and that the State of Colorado be declared to be one of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever.

Section two declares the State of Colorado entitled to all the rights, privileges, grants, and immunities, and subject to all the conditions and restrictions of an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 21, 1864.

Section three provides that this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within the State of Colorado there shall be no abridgement or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason of race or color, (excepting Indians not taxed.)

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to strike out the third section, and in lieu thereof to insert the following, which is substantially the same provision as that which the House has already incorporated into the Nebraska bill:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Colorado there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or any other rights to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature elected under said State constitution, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act, upon the receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the governor-elect of said State within sixty days after the passage of this act to act upon the condition submitted herein.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask my colleague to let me offer the following amendment:

That if the people of said State of Colorado shall so amend their constitution as that no discrimination shall be made on account of race or color in the right of the citizens therein to the elective franchise, the same shall be admitted by proclamation of the President on an equal footing with the other States.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I cannot yield for that purpose. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 70, noes 40.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. FINCK demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 63, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Koontz, Kuykendall, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McRuer, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Stevens, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baker, Benjamin, Bergen, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Bundy, Campbell, Reader W. Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Deffrees, Delano, Eldridge, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Henderson, Hill, Hise, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Hunter, Johnson, Kerr, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Leftwich, Marshall, McKee, Miller, Niblack, Nicholson, Plants, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Stokes, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Andrew H. Ward, Henry D. Washburn, and Whaley—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Beaman, Bidwell, Blow, Bromwell, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Darling, Dawson, Denison, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Harris, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jones, Kasson, Ketcham, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loan, Marston, McCullough, Myers, Noell, Phelps, Pomeroy, Rousseau, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—44.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 60, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Dawes, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Longyear, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stokes, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—90.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baker, Bergen, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Buckland, Campbell, Cooper, Davis, Defrees, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Hise, Hoggan, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Kelso, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, Leftwich, Lynch, Marshall, Maynard, McKee, Morrill, Niblack, Nicholson, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, and Whaley—60.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Barker, Beaman, Bidwell, Blow, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Darling, Dawson, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Harris, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jones, Kasson, Ketcham, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loan, McCullough, Myers, Noell, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Rousseau, Scofield, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—41.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. STOKES stated that his colleague, Mr. ARNELL, was absent; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague, Mr. KASSON, would have voted "ay" if he were present.

Mr. O'NEILL. My colleague, Mr. MYERS, who is absent on business of a committee, would have voted for the bill had he been present.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I wish to make the same statement in regard to the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. CLARKE, that I made upon the passage of the Nebraska bill. He is necessarily absent, and if present would have voted for the bill.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House adjourn.

WAR DEBTS OF THE LOYAL STATES.

Mr. BLAINE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Debts of the Loyal States, reported a bill to reimburse the States that furnished troops to the Union Army for advances made and expenses incurred in raising the same; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee.

The motion of Mr. SCHENCK to adjourn was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. CULVER: Three petitions from citizens of Venango and Crawford counties, Pennsylvania, against the reduction of the currency.

Also, a petition from refiners and citizens of various States, asking a reduction of the internal revenue tax on refined petroleum, and a change in the mode of assessing the same to conform to general manufactures, by fixing a percentage ad valorem on refined petroleum and naphtha sold for consumption in the United States.

By Mr. DAWES: The petition of H. Harrison, and 227 others, citizens of Westfield, Massachusetts, praying for a specific internal duty on cigars.

By Mr. DONNELLY: The petition of Stephen Hewson, and others, citizens of Isanti county, Minnesota, asking for the impeachment and removal from office of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

By Mr. HART: The petition of 79 citizens of Rush, Monroe county, New York, asking that the duties upon wool as fixed by the tariff bill passed by the House of Representatives in its last session may be adopted by Congress this session.

By Mr. INGERSOLL: The memorial of Edwin R. Hoag, of Cambridge, Illinois, praying for relief.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of 2,471 citizens of Richmond, Virginia, asking that a provisional government be established for Virginia, and the so-called restored State government be abolished.

By Mr. LONGYEAR: The petition of Edmund S. Tracy, and others, citizens of Eaton county, Michigan, asking for certain amendments to the bounty law of July 28, 1866.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of journeymen cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars, numerous signed, asking that the present tax law may be so modified as to prevent irregularity and injustice; that the inspections of cigars in the different districts may be made by a uniform system; that the tax be made specific at five dollars per thousand on all domestic cigars; that the tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged; that stamps may be sold to manufacturers at five dollars per thousand; and that the penalty for violating the internal revenue laws may be increased.

By Mr. PAINE: A memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Ontonagon, in the State of Michigan.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of 132 pensioners of the United States and employes in the civil service of the Government, for arrears of pension withheld by act of March 3, 1865.

By Mr. PIKE: The petition of Lord & Eveleth, of Winterport, Maine, for damages for breach of contract.

Also, the petition of Asa Thurlough and 63 others, of Monroe, Maine, for amendment of Constitution providing that there shall be no inequality among citizens on account of birth, race, color, or previous inequality.

By Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts: The petition of the Boston Board of Trade, for the removal of obstructions to navigation in Boston harbor.

By Mr. RITTER: The petition of S. M. Wing, C. R. Tyler, William Allen, and others, of the county of Daviess, and State of Kentucky, asking Congress to refrain from the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency.

By Mr. SCHENCK: A memorial of Joshua Hill, of Alabama, praying compensation for property taken for or destroyed by the armies of the United States during the rebellion, and when as a loyal citizen he had been granted protection for himself and his property.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 16, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. YATES presented two petitions of citizens of Illinois, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. WILSON presented three petitions of officers of the United States Army, and seven petitions of officers of the Army and Marine corps of the United States, praying for an increase of pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON. I also present the petition of John H. Cunningham and a large number of other persons employed in the Government Printing Office, one hundred and nineteen of whom have been in the public service in the Army, praying that the benefits of the joint resolution now pending before Congress giving twenty per cent. additional pay to clerks, messengers, &c., may be extended to them. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance, which I believe has the subject under consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented two memorials of citizens of Michigan, remonstrating against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or a return within a limited time to specie payments, and against compelling national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting national banks from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Charles J. Gallagher, late a private soldier in company G, first Michigan Veteran volunteer cavalry regiment, praying that he may be allowed the amount paid by him for transportation from the place of his discharge to the place of his enlistment; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying for an appropriation for the construction of certain piers and a light-house at the entrance of Thunder Bay river into Thunder bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, in favor of a ship-canal across the St. Clair flats; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present a communication in the nature of a petition from some ladies who represent themselves as folders in the Post Office Department, claiming that they have been omitted in the joint resolution which has been passed by the House of Representatives providing for increased compensation to the civil employes of the Government, and asking to be embraced in that resolution. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or a return within a limited time to specie payments, and against compelling national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting national banks from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the petition of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society, signed by their president, James Mott, by their corresponding secretary, Benjamin C. Bacon, and by their recording secretary, E. M. Davis, in which they earnestly pray Congress to prepare such an amendment to the United States Constitution, to be presented to the several States for ratification, as will forever prevent any distinction in the right of suffrage on account of race or color. I ask the reference of this petition to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

It was so referred.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present eleven petitions from citizens of North Carolina, who call themselves "loyal colored citizens of North Carolina," in which they ask Congress to pass into a law the bill introduced into the House of Representatives on the 18th of December, 1866, by Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, to establish civil government in North Carolina, or to pass some bill similar in character, so that civil government may be speedily established on a thoroughly loyal basis, and North Carolina restored to her former relations in the Union. I ask the reference of these petitions to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

They were so referred.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition of Joseph Humphries, representing that he was a gunner's mate on board the United States schooner Shark when she was wrecked at the mouth of the Columbia river on the 10th of September, 1846, and praying for compensation for the losses suffered by him in consequence of that disaster; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRIS presented six petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

He also presented the petition of Thomas Little and others, pensioners, praying for a modification of the pension act of June 16, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, instructing the Senators in Congress from that State to use their influence to prevent the repeal of the act of July 4, 1864, and the substitution of an assay office in Oregon for the branch mint provided for in that act; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of Lancaster, Erie county, New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of George L. Elder, lieutenant of company D, ninety-ninth regiment New York volunteers, praying for relief for the officers of said company who were on board of the United States frigate Congress when that vessel was attacked and destroyed by the rebel ram Merrimac, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, (S. No. 508,) for the relief of the officers of company D of the ninety-ninth regiment New York volunteers. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 492) to protect the rights of married women, and for other purposes, in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

COOLIE TRADE.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations have directed me to report a resolution in reference to the coolie trade; and in making this report I desire to say that the committee considered the question whether the resolution should be a joint resolution, which of course would require the action of both bodies and the signature of the President, or a concurrent resolution, which of course would require the action of the two bodies in harmony, or whether it would be enough to be simply a resolution of this body. While the subject was under consideration a similar resolution was introduced into the other House and there passed. It seemed, therefore, that the committee would do their duty if they reported the resolution simply as a Senate resolution, and ask the immediate action of this body upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the present consideration of the resolution now reported by him from the Committee on Foreign Relations. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the report on the day it is made. No objection being made, the resolution is before the Senate, and will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Whereas the traffic in laborers transported from China and other eastern countries, known as the coolie trade, is odious to the people of the United States as inhuman and immoral; and whereas it is abhorrent to the spirit of modern international law and policy, which have substantially extirpated the African slave trade, to permit the establishment in its place of a mode of enslaving men different from the former in little else than the employment of fraud instead of force to make its victims captive: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the duty of this Government to give effect to the moral sentiment of the nation through all its agencies for the purpose of preventing the further introduction of coolies into this hemisphere or the adjacent islands.

Mr. SUMNER. I will read a very brief letter which has been put into my hands, dated "Hong Kong, November 14, 1866." It will be seen that it is a very late letter for one coming so far. It is as follows:

"Hard times are upon the Chinese and the coolie trade flourishes. Twenty-two vessels were loading at one time at Macao. The negro slave trade was never half as bad as this traffic, which will ruin regular migration of the Chinese. It is time a stop had been put to this business. So much reascality is done in it that the Chinese suspect every offer of going abroad."

The resolution was adopted.

SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 177) to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, have instructed me to report them back to the Senate with a recommendation that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House; and I ask for their present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House to the bill. The amendments were read, as follows:

In section five, line three, page 2, after the word "on" insert the word "special."

In section five, page 2, line fifteen, strike out the words "such deposit and" and insert in lieu thereof the word "the."

In section five, page 2, line eighteen, strike out the words "funds of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "funds belonging to."

In section five, page 3, lines nineteen and twenty, strike out the words "or such money or funds as may be deposited with said company for that purpose."

At the end of the bill add the following:

"Nor be deemed to authorize the said corporation to pay interest on deposit of money, securities, or any other property deposited with it; and the operations of this corporation shall be confined to the District of Columbia."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate concur in these amendments made by the House of Representatives to the bill? The Chair will take the question on the amendments collectively, unless some Senator asks for a separate vote on each amendment.

The amendments were concurred in.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. MORRILL. The same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate instructing them to inquire into the transactions of the city council in granting certain rights and privileges to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in introducing its road into this District, have instructed me to report in part a bill which I have the honor now to present; and I ask for its present consideration.

The bill (S. No. 507) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the extension, construction, and use by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of a railroad from and between Knoxville and the Monocacy Junction into and within the District of Columbia," approved July 25, 1866, was read a first time by its title, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that the bill may be read at large.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine in reporting this bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia asks for its present consideration. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill the day it is reported. Is there any objection?

Mr. GRIMES. We can hear it read before we decide that question, I suppose. I should like to hear it read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That instead of the right granted to said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company by the act approved July 25, 1866, to extend their said road "into and within the District of Columbia to such point or points, terminus or termini, as may be agreed upon between said company and the corporation of Washington, in respect to a road within the limits of Washington, and between the said company and the corporation of Georgetown, as respects a road within the limits of Georgetown," said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company are hereby authorized to extend their said road into and within the limits of the District of Columbia on such line and to such place or places as upon actual survey and plan of the same may be authorized by Congress, and not otherwise.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the present consideration of this bill objected to? No objection being made, the bill is before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the effect of the bill is to take from the corporate authorities of Washington the right to control the road in the manner in which it is to come into the city, or whether it is to come in or not. I do not object to that. I think it perfectly right. The whole country is interested in the road which the company propose to make and are now, I believe, engaged in making. They are making a road from the Point of Rocks, the point of intersection with the main stem of their road that runs to Wheeling, and they propose to strike the District out here to the west somewhere. But I do not know how long Congress may sit. If Congress adjourns about the 1st of March, or the 1st of April, or the 1st of May, there will be nobody to pass upon the plans which the company may have for coming into the city, and it may obstruct the completion of the road for some six or seven months. I suggest therefore to my friend from Maine that perhaps it would be as well to amend the bill so as to leave the location of the road to the approval of the Secretary of War, or the President and Secretary of War, instead of Congress. Congress is rather an unwieldy body to pass upon a question of that description. I think perhaps the bill had better lie on the table for the present; and if my friend from Maine has no objection, I will move that it be laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. MORRILL. I want to make a statement.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will not make the motion now as the Senator from Maine wishes to say something.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the Senate sent to the Committee on the District of Columbia the other day a resolution instructing us to inquire into an arrangement supposed to be in the process of execution between this company and the corporation of Washington by which the corporation of Washington were to secure certain interests or rights, and were also to give to this company certain rights not contemplated by the act which authorized the extension of their road into this city. Upon an examination in part, the committee came to the conclusion that there is an attempt to couple other transactions with the powers they were authorized to exercise in regard to the extension of this road, which are not perhaps quite justified by the former act on this subject. We find that a committee of the council of this city have an act before them authorizing this company to extend its road into this city and to a point on First street, in connection with the depot of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, as now established; but this is to be done upon the condition that that road shall maintain its present location until 1910, a matter certainly over which it is difficult to conceive that the city of Washington would have any right or ought to have any desire to control, and which I can hardly conceive that the Congress of the United States would be willing they should exercise.

By the act of 1866 it was enacted that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company might extend their road into the city in such manner, and to such place as should be agreed on with the corporate authorities of Washington and Georgetown. We are not aware that anything has been done on the subject, and so believe the whole matter is within the power of Congress at the present moment. I say for myself, it is a matter entirely inadvertent, so far as I am concerned, that this company was authorized to exercise any such power as this, because we have not given it to any other company. The bill that was reported the other day authorizing the proposed Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to extend their road into this District was upon the precise terms and conditions contemplated by this bill; and the simple question is, whether it is a proper thing for the Congress of the United States, in whom is exclusive legislative jurisdiction of this District, to part with that jurisdiction to a corporation; whether we shall allow a railroad coming from the West to enter this District at such place and in such manner and to make its depot in such place or places as shall be indicated by the city corporation, or whether we shall keep this power within ourselves? To the mind of the committee it is most obvious that the propriety of the thing is that the Congress of the United States should allow railroads to come into this city, and so near as within three squares of this Capitol, only in such manner and to such place as should be authorized by Congress itself, having before it the maps and surveys upon which the company contemplate action.

Now, in reply to the suggestion of my honorable friend from Maryland, that Congress is a clumsy body, I can hardly see the force of that, because Congress acts by its committees, and it is an every-day occurrence that upon the smallest matters, even the location of a street, we are consulted. No street in this city can be changed even without the consent of Congress. We do not propose to waive that right. Upon a matter of so grave consideration as the location of a railway into this District, crossing streets and avenues, and necessarily affecting the use of those streets and avenues, I suggest whether it is not vastly important that Congress should retain its power and should not delegate it to any parties whatever?

It will be seen that it is quite necessary that this action should be taken early, because the bill must go to the House of Representatives, and in the mean time I hardly know what may be done. I should hope, therefore, if the bill is not to receive the present action of the Senate, which I very much hope it will, it will receive its attention at an early day.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdrew the motion to enable my friend from Maine to make the explanation which he has made in relation to the bill. I renew the motion that it lie on the table.

Mr. GRIMES. And be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed under the rule, being reported from a committee.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 509) to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 157) in relation to ocean mail service between San Francisco, in California, and Portland, in Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. NESMITH, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Susan Coody and others, Cherokees, praying indemnity for property destroyed by some of the United States soldiers near Fort Gibson, in the year 1845, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 462) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union; which was to strike out the third section of the bill, in these words:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason of race or color, (excepting Indians not taxed.)

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act, upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as part of the organic law of the State; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the territorial Governor within thirty days after the passage of this act, to act upon the condition submitted herein.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment of the House. It is quite evident to my mind, and of course that is as far as is necessary for my action, either that Congress have the power in setting up this Territory into a State to declare what shall be the practical exercise of equal rights there, or else it must be left to the people of the Territory in their original capacity as a people in the act of forming their constitution to decide. There is no middle ground. We might just as well, it appears to me, leave it to the common council of the city of Washington to decide how that shall be in the Territory of Nebraska as to the Legislature, I mean just as well upon legal grounds; and therefore it is that, without going into a fresh debate on the subject, but merely stating my reason for my position, I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I agree with my friend from Vermont, that one of two propositions must be true; and if either is true this amendment ought not to be adopted, in the form in which it is. Either Congress has the authority to impose of itself without the consent of the people of Nebraska such a condition as is now in the bill, and which does not differ at all from the one contained in the amendment proposed by my friend from Vermont, or the power is in the people of the State. The amendment made by the House leaves it to the Legislature of Nebraska to decide whether the constitution which the people of the State have adopted shall be changed in a very important particular. If that is a proper mode of legislation, Congress can change the constitution of the State in any other particular without consulting the people of Nebraska. For that reason, therefore, which is the same as that suggested by my friend from Vermont, I shall be unable to vote for a concurrence with the amendment of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of concurrence.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not expect that this bill would be called up this morning. I intended to propose the amendment which was submitted before by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN,] not that I believe Congress ought to impose any conditions upon the admission of the State, but I do believe that if Congress undertakes to change the constitution that the people of a State have adopted, that proposed change ought to be submitted to some authority in the State that has control of the subject. It is very clear to my mind that Congress cannot change the constitution of a State; and I think it is equally clear that the Legislature of a State cannot change the constitution of the State, whether in the act of admission or afterward. It is not a legislative act. In the absence of authority in the constitution itself for the Legislature to change it, how is it possible for the Legislature now to provide that negroes may vote in the State of Nebraska when the constitution of what State as adopted by the people expressly prohibits it? But I have not the amendment prepared and therefore cannot offer it. I think that the measure ought to be amended so as to refer the subject to the people.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him how this differs from the case of the admission of Missouri?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; I will state how I understand it to differ, and it is but repeating what I had occasion to say before the holidays. The provision in the constitution of Missouri was that the Legislature should have authority to pass laws prohibiting the immigration of persons of color. The act of Congress was simply undertaking to declare by Congress that a construction should not be given to that provision of the State constitution which should be in violation of the Constitution of the United States. It was not affirmative legislation on the part of Congress. It was not an attempt on the part of Congress to change the constitution of Missouri, but in advance to declare by Congress that a construction should not be given to that article, or any other article, in violation of the Constitution of the United States. Here is a question over which the people of the State under the Constitution of the United States have exclusive control—the question of suffrage expressly given to the people of the State by the Constitution of the United States. They have exclusive control of it, and in this constitution the people of Nebraska have said that persons of color shall not vote in that State. The Senate said that by an act of Congress we could amend that constitution so as to give the right of suffrage to everybody. The House of Representatives disagrees with the Senate. The House says that the Legislature of the State must concur in that action. But what force and validity does that give to the action of the Senate? None; because it is not a legislative act to change the constitution of the State when the constitution does not provide for a mode of amendment. Who can change the constitution of Nebraska? Can Congress do it? This amendment admits that Congress cannot do it. Then can Congress and the Legislature of the Territory or the Legislature of the proposed State, change the constitution of the State? I think no Senator will say so.

The distinguished Senator from Vermont, who claims the power for Congress on the admission of a State to model its constitution according to the pleasure of Congress, himself says that the Legislature of the State has no control over it; that that is nothing. This constitution, if it has any force at all as a constitution for a proposed State, has force because it has received the sanction of the people. Now, can any authority in Nebraska short of the people change that constitution? I am free to say that if the people of Nebraska change this constitution so as to allow negroes to vote I have no objection to it. I think it is a question exclusively within their control. If they let them vote I have no objection. If this amendment of the House of Representatives be so amended as to submit the question to the people, and they decide in favor of it, let it go; but if they decide against it, what Senator wants to change the constitution of Nebraska against the will of the people of the State? I shall not offer the amendment, because I have it not prepared. I make these suggestions on the question. I cannot myself vote for any of the conditions that are imposed upon the State.

Mr. MORRILL. It is difficult for me to see the distinction which appears so plain to the Senator from Indiana. In the case of Missouri the constitution provided, as has been stated by the Senator from Indiana, that the Legislature should have power to exclude a certain class of persons. That is substantially the provision here. It is with the question of exclusion in the constitution of Nebraska that we are dealing. The cases were, both of them, equally questions of exclusion. Now, how should they be dealt with? Congress undertook in the Missouri case to provide by act of Congress, which should be regarded as fundamental, that if Missouri came in as a State that act of Congress should be binding upon her, and being binding upon her should overrule her constitutional provision. That was the point.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Constitution of the United States provides that the citizens of each State shall have all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens of the several States. I believe that is the language very nearly. Now, I ask the Senator from Maine whether the provision of the constitution of Missouri prohibiting persons of color from coming into that State who might be citizens of other States, in his judgment, was in conflict with this provision of the Constitution of the United States? If in conflict, was not that provision of the constitution of Missouri void? And in that view was it not proper for Congress expressly to disclaim an approval of that proposition, it being deemed by Congress unconstitutional? Is that case at all analogous to the one before us, which is the case of a State regulating the right of suffrage, the right to do which is exclusively given to the State by the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. MORRILL. I did not misunderstand the point taken by the honorable Senator from Indiana before. I understood him before to say as he now repeats himself. But it was not the subject-matter of the Constitution with which I was dealing; it was the method of reaching it by Congress, and in both instances it is the same. The Senate must remember that, in the case of Missouri, Congress did not undertake to nullify that provision of the constitution of Missouri; but it proceeded apparently upon the ground that it was at least doubtful whether she might not do that thing, and provided in the very terms of the act that the act of Congress should be regarded as a fundamental condition upon which she should be admitted, and being fundamental should overrule her constitution. In that case it was the validity of the act of Congress which was relied upon to correct the irregularity in the constitution of Missouri. So here precisely: we are to admit Nebraska; but there being a feature in her constitution which is regarded as objectionable, the House of Representatives have proceeded, in the very language of the act in the case of Missouri, as I recollect it, to say that it shall be done upon the fundamental condition that the objectionable provision in her constitution shall never be construed to have the effect that is provided for in that constitution.

I submit to my friend from Indiana, waiving the question of the subject-matter in the two cases, that the method of proceeding is precisely parallel.

Mr. HENDERSON. We discussed the question of the admission of Nebraska and Colorado as States for I think three weeks in the Senate, and I really believe there is but little of a practical character in the entire discussion. I presume, whether this amendment be effective or not, we shall not enfranchise more than four or five negroes in each of these proposed States by virtue of this doctrine. I believe there are very few negroes in Nebraska, and perhaps the amendment, if effective for the purpose, will not enfranchise more than four or five. But really, if we admit the State upon any terms whatever, I believe that, in the course of a very short time at least, the right to vote will be conceded to the colored population there. I have very little doubt that that will be the result, whatever action we take here.

After the former discussion the Senate adopted the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont; which I really thought would avail nothing to secure the object intended, and yet I did not see fit to vote against the proposition to admit the State, because that amendment had been adopted. I saw that it could at any rate do no harm; and if the courts should decide that it was a valid condition, and effectuated the object, the result would be to accomplish an object I desired; and therefore I voted for the bill with that amendment attached to it. It went to the House of Representatives; and the House, in order to make it effective, propose to require that the condition shall be submitted to the State Legislature and approved by them. Now, I feel as I did originally in regard to the amendment offered here. If the Legislature adopt it it amounts to nothing. I do not feel that it will be obligatory upon the State: but at the same time I am willing to vote for the admission of Nebraska without any such amendment at all; because, in the first place, as I have said, it does not in my honest opinion affect five voters in Nebraska, and it will never affect more than a few, and in the second place I honestly believe that with whatever provisions we pass a bill admitting the State the colored population there will be secured in the franchise as early the one way as the other. I have no question on that point, and therefore I have no hesitancy in voting for the proposition to admit these two States without any amendment whatever. I do not believe the amendment will be effectual to accomplish anything.

In regard to the Missouri case I was inclined to agree with the Senator from Indiana at first; but on referring to the constitution of the State of Missouri at that time I find that the provision which Congress required the State to give a different construction to was a provision clearly pointing to free negroes. The provision was:

"It shall be the duty of the Legislature, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming into and settling in this State under any pretext whatsoever."

It refers directly to free negroes and mulattoes. When the constitution came to Congress, Congress was unwilling to admit the State under that provision, fearing that the passage of such laws would violate the provision of the Constitution of the United States guarantying the privileges and immunities of citizens of all the States to citizens of the several States, and they passed this resolution:

"Resolved, &c., That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted on the part of said State to Congress"—

The intention was of course to strike at the section I have read, but Congress did not name it properly and missed the clause intended to be described; but the provision was that the clause—

"shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States in this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of the said act, upon the receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete."

The Senate will see that in the first place it is exceedingly doubtful whether, according to the public opinion then entertained, anything was accomplished at all by this declaration. It is true Congress said that a certain construction should not be given to a clause in the constitution of Missouri, but it is well known to the Senator from Indiana and other Senators that at that period of time it was very generally understood by American statesmen that the negro was not a citizen of the United States, and it was so held until very recently, until even the beginning of the late rebellion. I believe the rights of citizenship were not then extended to negroes. It is very questionable, indeed, whether the Legislature of Missouri, under the construction then given, would not have had authority still to exclude free negroes and mulattoes from the State, and the truth of the matter is that the State exercised the authority and laws were passed by the State, notwithstanding this "fundamental condition," to exclude free negroes from her borders. Up to the beginning of the rebellion there were laws upon the statute-book of the State of Missouri excluding free negroes, notwithstanding this fundamental condition, and it is a notorious fact that the best lawyers of the State, among them Mr. Geyer, who was in the convention and afterward in the Legislature, and subsequently a Senator in this body, always held to the doctrine that this provision was not binding upon the State; and there never was any attempt on the part of Congress to interfere with the legislation of the State prohibiting free negroes from settling in it. My own impression is that that construction was correct. I do not pretend to say what would have been the construction of Mr. Geyer if it had been held that negroes were citizens. He always held that they were not citizens of the United States. Perhaps if it had been then settled that they were citizens he might have held the contrary opinion as to the power of the State; but I do not know what, in that case, would have been the opinion of himself or of others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 453.

Mr. WADE. I move that that be laid aside so that we may dispose of the Nebraska and Colorado bills. I believe they will not cause any further lengthy debate. The subject has been debated so long that it seems to me nothing new can be said on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the present and all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate bill No. 456.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senate will not do that. It is quite evident that this measure with the new complication which is now attached to it—a proposition which received the disapproval of a very large majority of the Senate on a vote the other day—will not be disposed of without considerable debate; and I think, inasmuch as the regular order of business is now reached, and that is a matter of very considerable importance also, and one which I hope we shall finish to-day, this other measure will take its usual course, so that we shall be able to-morrow to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 15, noes 15.

Mr. RAMSEY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Williams—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Creswell, Davis, Fessenden, Guthrie, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—11.

So the motion of Mr. WADE was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor on the question before the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I had about concluded what I intended to say. My only object in rising was to express the hope that we might get rid of this question, and I do not know of any better way than to accept the amendment of the House of Representatives. The Senate, I presume, in the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont originally, desired to use simply a constraining influence upon the people of Nebraska and Colorado to enfranchise the colored population. There are, perhaps, from five to ten negroes in each of those Territories, and their enfranchisement will be the only effect the amendment will have, even if it be effective, to accomplish the object designed. The House of Representatives seem to think that the amendment adopted by the Senate will not be effective, and they think that if it shall be consented to by the Legislatures of these two States it will have the effect. Now I have no objection to that amendment if it shall be so thought; and my impression being that, even though it shall not be effective to accomplish the object, these States will enfranchise the blacks, I shall vote for the proposition and hope that in that way we shall dispose of this question. The dispute really amounts to but little; and as I believe a majority of the Senate are inclined to admit these States now, and inasmuch as they think they ought to be admitted aside from the question which is now pending and which is not a practical question and is not one of very great importance anyhow, in my judgment we had better admit them.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it be practicable for the Secretary to put his hand upon the amendment which was proposed to this bill originally by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Brown,] I will move to substitute that for the House amendment.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment to the House amendment; which was to strike out all after the word "that" and insert the following:

This act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person, by reason of race or color, and upon the further condition that this fundamental condition shall be submitted to the voters of the Territory of Nebraska at an election to be held on the first Tuesday of — next. And at such election said voters shall declare their assent to or dissent from the condition aforesaid in such form as shall be prescribed by the Governor of said Territory. And all votes given at such election shall be returned to such Governor within — days from the day of the election, who shall forthwith canvass the same. And if a majority of such votes shall be for this condition the Governor shall certify that fact to the President of the United States, who shall by proclamation announce the fact; whereupon, without further proceedings on the part of Congress, this act shall take effect.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is suggested to me that the words "excepting Indians not taxed" ought to be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the power of the Senator to modify his own amendment, and it will be modified at his suggestion by inserting those words.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before a vote is had on this amendment, it is due to myself to say that I am not in favor of annexing conditions to States upon their admission when those States come here properly; but now we have to select between what I esteem two evils, between this proposition and the proposition that comes from the House of Representatives. There is truth in what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] has said in one respect, that is there are not many persons perhaps in Nebraska who would be enfranchised under this proposition; but practically it is a very important question when we consider that we are fixing a precedent that may be extended to other and very important matters when other States ask to be admitted. This precedent will establish that the Congress of the United States and the territorial Legislature have the power to change a constitution that the people have deliberately made.

This same question is to come up on the Colorado bill. There it was submitted expressly to the people whether they would have negro suffrage, and upon a popular vote they voted it down by a much larger majority than was given in favor of the constitution. Now, we propose to override that popular vote of the people, the people who make States, who make State constitutions; we propose to override that by submitting it to a territorial Legislature that, in my judgment, is not competent, under the Constitution and the laws, to decide a question of this sort.

I think it is important to avoid a precedent so dangerous in the future. A constitution may come up from one of our future western States with a provision not agreeable to Congress upon some other question not touching the negro at all, touching their material interests, touching their mineral interests perhaps, some great interest; and Congress may interpose to change that constitution without allowing the people the opportunity to express their wish upon it.

I wish to avoid that precedent; and although I am not in favor of a general proposition of annexing conditions of this sort to the admission of States, yet I think it is better to submit the question here proposed to the people than to submit it to the Legislature; and my amendment raises simply this point: shall we submit this proposition to the people who are sovereign upon the question of making a constitution and State government, or shall we submit it to the Legislature that has no jurisdiction over it?

If the people of the Territory of Nebraska are not in favor of this proposition, what Senator wants to force it upon them? Does not the Constitution of the United States leave to the people of each State the exclusive control of this question of suffrage; and do we want to take away from them that which the Constitution leaves with them? But my principal purpose is to avoid a precedent which I think will become dangerous in the future, and therefore I offer this amendment. The only effect of my amendment, I desire most distinctly to say, is that this question shall be submitted to the people, instead of the territorial Legislature.

Mr. WADE. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Does he propose to vote for the bill if his amendment is attached to it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is a question which it was hardly necessary to ask, because the bill is not again to be voted upon. But, sir, I will act in good faith upon this question: you adopt this amendment and I will vote for the amendment.

Mr. WADE. Oh, yes, "for the amendment!" I presume so.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator how I can vote for or against the bill now? He asks me a question that I cannot answer, for I cannot vote for the bill or against it: the bill is not before the Senate. But I answer the question in its force and meaning by saying that if he will adopt this and let the question go to the people I will vote for it and let the people decide; and if they decide that they want negro suffrage in Nebraska, let it be so; I am content.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not rise for the purpose of taking any part in this debate, but simply to notify the Senate that it was my design to call up the tariff bill to-morrow; but, under the circumstances, with so many questions pending, I have concluded to defer it a little longer, and I now give notice that I shall ask the Senate to take up that bill on Monday next. It is very pressing; we have but a short time left; and we have as yet hardly done any of the absolutely necessary business of the session. No one of the appropriation bills has yet come from the House. I shall on Monday move to take up the tariff bill, and shall insist upon it so far as it is in my power to insist, asking the Senate to postpone any other business that may be in the way of it at that time.

Mr. WADE. I do not propose to go into any argument on this question. It was heretofore argued so much in this body that I believe every Senator who saw fit to participate in the debate had ample opportunity to do so and to define his position upon every point connected with it that could be thought of. And I abstain because I know that if we do not forbear somewhat from debate on these questions the business of the Senate will be very much obstructed. I ask the friends of the bill to vote down all these amendments and take the amendment of the House of Representatives, in order to get rid of the subject in some way or other as soon as we can. I will not debate it; I will not be provoked into any further discussion on the subject; and I wish the friends of the bill would stand by the House amendment if they can, and let us end the matter one way or the other with as little delay as possible.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not about to continue the debate, but merely to state why I think the precedent in the case of Missouri has no application to the one before us. That question had not been before the Senate at any antecedent period.

It is true, as is stated by my friend from Missouri, that at that time there were differences of opinion in the country whether negroes who had been born free in any of the States of the Union, either because their ancestors were free, or because slavery had been abolished in the State where they were born, were citizens or not of the United States. Massachusetts entertained a very decided opinion that they were citizens. Some of the very best men of the country entertained the same opinion, and that opinion was entertained by I suppose a large majority of the members who constituted the Congress at the time the Missouri act was passed. If they were citizens, then clearly the provision of the State constitution which gave to the Legislature or proposed to give to the Legislature of Missouri the right by law to exclude them from coming into the State was in violation of the clause of the Constitution of the United States to which my friend from Missouri has referred. Since then, to be sure, the Supreme Court of the United States by a majority decided that they were not citizens within the meaning of the judicial clause of the Constitution of the United States, and that they were therefore not competent to sue in the United States courts. But, as the Senate are not now to be told, there were very grave doubts whether that decision in that particular was a sound one or not. Two of the ablest men who have ever been in that tribunal held that it was not sound—the late Mr. Justice McLean and Mr. Justice Curtis. Mr. Justice Nelson expressed no opinion at all upon that point. At the time the constitution of Missouri was before Congress on the question as to the admission of that State into the Union under that constitution, that was a very litigated question; but the result has been that the public judgment has pronounced, independent of our civil rights bill or the subsequent constitutional amendment, that black men are citizens.

Acting upon that assumption, Congress claimed the right—and I think they had it if the assumption was well taken—to annex to their act admitting the State of Missouri into the Union a condition that that provision in the constitution of the State, which they believed to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, should be considered thereafter as a nullity. My friend [Mr. HENDERSON] tells me it would have been a nullity upon that assumption if Congress had admitted them without condition; but from abundant caution Congress thought proper to attach the condition. I think the caution was well taken. It is the duty of Congress, when they are called upon to act at all in their legislative capacity, to provide that no article in the Constitution of the United States upon which depend the rights of the citizens shall be violated at all; not to leave it as a matter of doubt to have the question hereafter decided by the Supreme Court, because so to leave it is to encourage litigation and to continue an angry state of feeling throughout the country upon a very vital question. The members of Congress at that time, I have no doubt, really thought (and as the result has since proved they were correct in thinking) that free black men were just as much citizens as free white men; and in order to guard against an interference with the rights which attached to them as citizens, Congress said to Missouri: "The provision which you have in your constitution shall not by you be used for the purpose of interfering with any of those rights."

That is not this case. In this case I suppose it can hardly be doubted that without attaching this condition the State of Nebraska and the State of Colorado, when they come to be admitted, will have the right to regulate the question of suffrage. They will have a right to say whether white men alone shall vote, what qualifications the white men who are to vote shall have, or whether the black men and not the white men shall vote; and so in relation to the qualifications of the blacks. What we are about to do, therefore, is to interfere with that right which has heretofore been considered as sacred—the right of a State to regulate the question of suffrage. I agree with my friend from Indiana, that as that is a question which belongs to the States exclusively to decide, when they are asked to give that right away, to surrender it, the question should be submitted to them.

For these reasons I think the precedent of the Missouri case has no application at all to the measures which are now before us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Riddle, Sumner, and Williams—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Fogg, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Guthrie, Howe, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Saulsbury, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—13.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on concurring in the amendment made by the House of Representatives, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Fessenden, Fogg, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, and Saulsbury—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Creswell, Davis, Guthrie, Howe, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, and Trumbull—10.

So the amendment was concurred in.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. WADE. I move now to take up the Colorado bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 462) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union, the House amendment being to strike out all of the third section of the bill after the enacting clause and in lieu of it to insert:

That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Colorado there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature, elected under said State constitution, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act, upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the Governor-elect of said State within thirty days after the passage of this act to act upon the condition submitted herein.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of concurring in that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Hendricks, Johnson, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, and Saulsbury—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Fogg, Guthrie, Howe, McDougall, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, and Trumbull—13.

So the amendment was concurred in.

FRENCH INTERVENTION IN MEXICO.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up the resolution submitted by me some time since, which was under consideration yesterday morning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not intend to indicate any opinion as to the merits of the resolution, but I hope the pending business will not be put aside for the purpose of taking up that resolution. I do not see that there is any immediate necessity for its consideration, and it opens an unbounded field of debate, and there is a necessity that the question regularly before the Senate should be disposed of as soon as practicable so that it can be understood what is to be the policy of Congress in reference to appointments to and removals from office.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not think this resolution will lead to any debate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Michigan desires particularly the consideration of this resolution now, I shall not oppose it. I did design to submit some remarks on the Mexican question to the Senate and would have liked to submit them on this resolution; but of course I will not ask him to postpone calling it up if he desires its immediate consideration.

Mr. HOWARD. I am anxious that the resolution should pass; but still if any gentleman desires to address the Senate upon it I will not insist upon occupying the time of the body with it to-day. I am not apprehensive, however, that much time will be occupied in its discussion.

Mr. CONNESS. I believe the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations intends to address the Senate on this subject. I expect that that is the case to some extent. I hope it will not be taken up now, but that we shall go on and finish the other subject alluded to by the Senator from Oregon, for even if that be not of pressing importance it is certainly clear that we shall not get to other business until it is disposed of.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to say that I certainly have no purpose of addressing the Senate at any length on this subject. I do not think at this moment, just at this juncture, debate on the question is expedient. I am sure there is no occasion for it; and it is not a little curious that while my excellent friend [Mr. HOWARD] yesterday in his elaborate speech was declaring his disbelief that the French troops were about to leave Mexico, or that they ever would leave Mexico, the morning paper contained a distinct announcement that troops were going en masse, as it was expressed, to Vera Cruz to embark for France. All official and private information is to the same effect. I had yesterday in my hands a dispatch which had been communicated to me from the State Department, from our consul at Vera Cruz, announcing the arrival in that harbor of an Austrian frigate to receive Maximilian. That I had on my desk while the Senator was speaking asking for information on the subject and declaring his entire disbelief that the French troops would ever leave Mexico in any reasonable time.

I beg to inform that Senator that while we are now speaking the French troops are getting on board their transports for France. Does not the Senator hear the sound of their embarkation and the whistle of their steam engines?

Mr. HOWARD. No.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; let him apply his ears and he will hear it. It comes in every wind from the South, and also from Europe itself. There is no doubt about it. The French troops are at this moment, while we are making this inquiry, on their way to Europe. The whole inquiry therefore is entirely unnecessary. But as I said yesterday I have no objection to the passage of the resolution and calling the attention of the committee to the subject, provided the resolution is in the received language of this body; that is, that the subject is committed to the discretion of the committee, charging them with the inquiry if in their judgment it shall be expedient. I proposed an amendment to the resolution like that yesterday. With that amendment I shall have no objection to the passage of the resolution. I have made these remarks as one reason why we should not proceed with it now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the present and all prior orders be postponed; that motion is in order.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the resolution will be taken up and passed by the Senate. It is one of importance because the information which it requires at the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations is itself very important to the country. I do not propose to go into the merits of the resolution, as the Senator from Massachusetts seems to have done. I said upon that subject almost all that I desired to say yesterday. I must at the same time, however, repeat that I regard these rumors to which he has given currency here in the Senate as of no more value than the thousand and one rumors with which the country has been amused during the last sixteen or eighteen months in regard to the withdrawal of the French troops from Mexico. I yesterday showed from the convention between the French Emperor and Maximilian the improbability of any such withdrawal. But that is not all that is covered by the resolution; it embraces a great number of other matters equally important to the country; and I hope the Senate will pass the resolution as it is presented and not adopt the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts giving to the Committee on Foreign Relations entire discretion whether to report upon these grave subjects or not. That discretion the committee have always possessed, and they might have exercised that discretion at any time heretofore. It is not for the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations or any other chairman of a committee here to claim the right of deciding what is expedient for the Senate to do in regard to these inquiries; it is for the Senate to decide whether or not it is expedient to call for the information, and not for the Committee on Foreign Relations, however wise and learned and industrious it may be.

The motion to take up the resolution was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 356) fixing the compensation for the bailiffs and criers of the courts of the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union; and

A bill (S. No. 462) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 356) fixing the compensation for the bailiffs and criers of the courts of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill regulating the tenure of offices.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 453) to regulate the tenure of offices, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. SUMNER to amend the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole by adding to it the following additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all officers or agents, except clerks of Departments, now appointed by the President or by the head of any Department, whose salary or compensation, derived from fees or otherwise, exceeds $1,000 annually, shall be nominated by the President and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the term of all such officers or agents who have been appointed since the 1st day of July, 1866, either by the President or by the head of a Department, without the advice and consent of the Senate, shall expire on the last day of February, 1867.

Mr. HOWE. I have been very much in favor of the pending bill and am still; and yet I shall feel profoundly sorry to see the Senate reject the pending amendment; and in spite of all I have heard I cannot imagine for my life what answer the Senate can give if it shall pass the bill and reject this amendment. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] says he does not want to incur the bill; he does not want to embarrass the bill. What does he want to pass the bill for unless he means to accomplish something by it? And if he means to accomplish anything by the passage of the bill I think he will have to put the amendment into the bill or he will not achieve anything much by the bill. Now, what is it that he aims to accomplish by the passage of the bill? What is the evil we are trying to redress?

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] said last night that he was in favor of the passage of this bill, because he had given notice at the last session that if the President persisted in reappointing to office persons who had been nominated to the Senate and rejected, then he would be in favor of some law to restrict this power of the President. And so the Senator from Maine seemed to be under the impression that by the passage of this bill we were aiming simply to prevent the President from reappointing to office men who had been nominated by him and had been rejected by the Senate.

If that be the main purpose of this bill, I have misapprehended it; and if that be the main purpose at which this bill aims, it is a very awkward attempt to achieve it. If my purpose were to prevent the President from appointing to office men who had been rejected by the Senate, I think I could find a more direct and a more certain way to accomplish that end than this bill. I think it would be sufficient for that purpose to say that if he did appoint to office one who had been rejected by the Senate it should be a crime, and that he should be punished for it in some mild way.

Mr. COWAN. By impeachment?

Mr. HOWE. By impeachment or by imprisonment during his natural life, and then to be hung until he was dead, [laughter,] or by fine, or by all. I think some such measure as that would be sufficient to put an end to that particular evil. But I do not understand that to be the purpose of this bill. I understand it to be the purpose of this bill to put the control of the offices of the country under the laws of the country. I understand it to be the purpose of this bill to say, first, that the President shall no longer exercise the power which has been heretofore exercised under the authority of a statute of the United States to dismiss men from office whenever he pleased, and men who had been appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is the purpose of the bill to deprive the President of the right to do these things. Now, is it right to do that?

On the other side we are told that it is essential that we should leave this power in the hands of the President; that the public business must suffer if you do not give him this control over these offices. I do not share at all in the apprehensions of those who reason that the public will be less faithfully served the moment we make a public officer understand that he is independent of the pleasure, the power, or the will of the Executive. On the contrary I am among those who believe that the country will only then begin to be faithfully served when public officers are made to feel that the tenure of their office is in the main limited to and dependent upon the continuance of this faithful service.

I do not propose to argue that question; but on this side of the House it seems to be very generally conceded that we ought to make these offices independent of the Executive pleasure. Well, what offices? If one, why not all? I said the other day that I thought the heads of Departments ought to be independent of the power of the President. No, Senators said all around me, not those; those are too important; those are confidential advisers of the President; those are the heads of the Executive Departments of the Government; you ought to leave in the hands of the President the control over those offices. Now, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts proposes to wrest from this absolute control of the President, this irresponsible authority of the President, some of the minor offices of the country; and we are told now they are too low, they are too humble, they are too insignificant; so that the head and the tail of this official corps we are to leave in the hands of the President. The Senator from Vermont seems to be distressed for fear the body of the corps will be in some way injured while we are trying to rescue the two extremities, or one or other of the extremities.

Mr. President, what is the objection urged against this amendment? It proposes to say in effect that all officers now appointed, either by the President without the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the head of a Department, who has a salary or a compensation of $1,000 per annum shall hereafter be appointed only by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and when we have said that the terms of those offices will be put under the same protection and the same security that you now propose to put other officers who are appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. What is the objection to this? The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CRAGIN] says; and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] echoes the Senator, that there are myriads of them, and it would introduce all sorts of confusion, and the business of legislation be stopped; that we should be overloaded. In the first place, Mr. President, instead of there being myriads, I believe the number to be very few. We are told that there is a countless host of inspectors in your custom-houses, of weighers and gaugers, of inspectors of spirits under your internal revenue laws, of assistant assessors, that would fall under this provision. There are a great many inspectors I believe in the New York custom-house—perhaps two or three hundred—the precise number I do not know. I believe in point of law they are not required to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not know of any such law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, according to law, on the nomination of the collector of the port.

Mr. HOWE. I am told by my friend from Vermont, and he is very likely to be correct, that they are by law to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the nomination of the collector. Well, then, practically they are appointed by the collector. There is no sort of sense in requiring this approval by the Secretary of the Treasury. It amounts to nothing; it is a mere form; but there are only two or three hundred of them any way in the city of New York, and that is probably three or four or five times the number there are in all the rest of the country. I do not think the Senate would be swamped if it had to confirm that number of inspectors. The number of weighers and of gaugers is much fewer. It is said there are a great many inspectors of whisky. There is but just one inspector to a distillery. There are but about thirty million people in the United States. I do not suppose they average more than one distillery to a man of them; you cannot have more than about thirty million of these inspectors. [Laughter.]

So it is undoubtedly true, as the Senator from Massachusetts said yesterday, that they can be counted, and I should not be at all surprised if upon the actual count it fell somewhat short of a distillery to a man. The number of distilleries in point of fact is limited, and I trust I shall live to see the day when you will not think it wise or sensible to put a confederate of a distiller to watch a distillery. I trust I shall live to see the day when that corps of officers will be dismissed from the public service. If I do not live to see that day, I trust I shall live to see another day when some one or two men or three are appointed to watch the inspector. One or the other of those measures, I am satisfied, is going to be absolutely essential.

But, Mr. President, there is no reason why an inspector, there is no reason why an assistant assessor should be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Until within a year the Secretary of the Treasury did not appoint assistant assessors. A special act was passed

I believe during the last session of Congress, and very early in the session, giving the appointment of assistant assessors to the Secretary of the Treasury. Up to that time they had been selected in fact and in law by the assessors themselves. I thought at the time, and I think now, with all deference to the action of Congress on that subject, they should still be selected by the assessors. I think practically they are selected by the assessors. There is no purpose in the world, unless I am grievously mistaken, in giving the Secretary of the Treasury anything to do with the ratification of those selections but the mere purpose of making them political machines, making them responsible to some man in the Government who is directly responsible to the President of the United States. That is the only purpose it subserves. The assessor really selects them, nominates them, dictates them to the Secretary of the Treasury.

I hope to see the selection of those officers once more restored to the assessors, as it was before. When that is done you will have but a few hundred officers provided for by this amendment. When that is done there will be but one officer in the State of Wisconsin that would come within the provisions of this amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. There will be but a very few in the United States unless I am mistaken. But if I am mistaken, and if the Senator from Maine and the Senator from New Hampshire are right in saying there are millions, I reply that the more there are of them the more the necessity for this provision. It is the very purpose, the life, the whole spirit of the bill to take this power and this patronage away from the Executive and put it nearer to the people themselves and to those who represent the people; and the more there is of this patronage the greater the necessity for taking it away from the President. And, sir, is it worth while to tell us that we cannot pass upon these nominations, be they more or less, in view of the large, the almost countless thousands—I guess I am exaggerating now in intimating that the thousands are countless—but the very many thousands of military officers that we have been passing upon every year during this late struggle? I think we are not to be deterred, having gone through with that labor, from attempting to pass upon even all the whisky inspectors and all the assistant assessors that may ever come to us.

But, Mr. President, if it were our business here in legislation to protect ourselves from labor, if that is the object and the purpose to animate us, we can save ourselves from a great deal more: just leave the work of making laws in the hands of the President, let him continue to make the laws as well as to appoint all the officers, and we should have a very easy time of it. Then we could devote ourselves exclusively to the work of drawing our salaries and spending them. I do not learn that the President is overburdened; I dare say he could attend to the work of making laws as well as appointing the officers; but I do not think we were sent here for the purpose of shirking those labors or any labors that properly attach to us. Nay, I think it is our business to seek labor and to perform it, whatever labor the service and the welfare of the country requires at our hands.

But the Senator from Maine urged yesterday that the President could not know all about these officers, he could not understand their character. Well, sir, I suppose he does not know much about most of them; I charitably hope he knows a very little. If he understood as much about them as I do, I think he would want somebody to help him different from what he has had to help him for a year or two past in the selection. But I must inquire very earnestly what there is in the constitution of the Secretary of the Treasury or the head of any Department which enables him to know more about these officers than the President does. The head of a Department is but a single man. The President is that.

Mr. CRAGIN. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Senator has just been arguing that these appointments practically are made by the collectors and assessors. I ask him if they do not know these men?

Mr. HOWE. Well, yes, I guess they do, Mr. President; but I do not think they know them any more when the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of the Navy appoints them than they would if the appointment was given to the President; no more in the one case than in the other. Undoubtedly they know something about them. I am inclined to think they know a little too much about them. The trouble is that those who represent the people of these States, and who by the Constitution are charged with the work of supervising the selection of these servitors, are not consulted, have no voice in the matter, have no control over it, because we have relinquished it, given it up. We who stand nearer than either the President or the head of any Department to the people shirk this duty and throw it upon somebody else.

Mr. President, I did not mean to belabor the Senate a great while upon this matter, and yet I am extremely anxious to see the amendment adopted or anxious to hear some reason assigned why the amendment should not be adopted. As I intimated at the outset, if it is a proper thing to be done at any time, why not do it on this bill as well as on another? This bill is working toward the same end. The Senator from Vermont certainly does not mean to urge that he has a copyright to this bill and that any amendment would be an infringement of his right in it. No one seems to assert anything of that kind. Why not put it in here? This paper on which he has drawn the bill is not too good to carry this proposition if it is a good proposition. If it is not a good proposition, tell us why it is not. But when you tell us that it is not wise, not judicious to take from the President the power over these other officers whose salaries are over a thousand dollars, I think you will have instructed me that it is not best for you to interfere at all; put your hands in your pockets where they have been for the last year; let the President go on; and if I was not in the Senate I should say run the machine, but I believe the expression would not be becoming in this place. I think it is best, at all events, for us to do our duty and our whole duty, or let it alone entirely and let somebody else do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think it is best for us to do our whole duty, or else to let it alone, and I do not think it best to let it alone; but I think one of our duties is, when we are passing measures, not to let the enthusiasm or the fanaticism of a little feeling of resentment and revenge, just resentment if you please, and just revenge as far as revenge can be just at all, run away with our common sense. The Constitution provided, and provided with a foreseeing eye to the future, that the appointment of inferior officers might be submitted by law to certain tribunals, not the Senate; and the obvious reason for that—it need not be enlarged upon—is the necessary convenience of the merely mechanical administrative operations of the Government. The larger the country grows and the more diversified become the necessary administrative functions that it is obliged to carry on, the more necessary it is, from mere reasons of convenience and good policy in the administration of the Government, that those minor offices should not be a burden and a curse to us as the advisers of the President in the selection of the general agents of the Government to carry on its operations through their subordinates, but that these subordinates ought to be selected in some other way. And the committee, of which the Senator has spoken, have reported to the other House a bill which provides how these subordinates shall be selected and how they shall be continued in office. That bill, however, seemed fit to us in quite a different way from this one; and it relates entirely to the inferior offices, merely mechanical, so to speak, most of them, which only require a certain degree of intelligence, and which, when that intelligence is sufficient and the party is appointed, ought to entitle him to make a life business of it if you please, and to continue to serve the country in that capacity as he would in any other calling until there shall be some fit and sufficient reason for changing him; and we propose to allow him to have promotion in the regular and proper and fair way, and all that.

We have submitted our views, as I have said, in a bill on that subject. They may be right or they may be wrong. In reporting this bill, however, we have not undertaken in any manner to decide the question what officers ought to be appointed by the concurrence of the Senate, and what not. This bill has nothing whatever to do with that question. It merely undertakes to readjust, according to what we conceive to be the true construction of the Constitution, the respective functions of two great departments of the Government. That is what we propose to do; and it is entirely immaterial to the consideration of that question whether A B or C D ought to be appointed by the concurrence of the Senate, or whether he ought to be appointed by the head of a Department. This bill goes upon the supposition that, given that the appointment of certain officers is by law to be by the concurrence of the Senate, the question then is how are they to hold their office and how are they to be removed. That is the point which this bill makes, and that is all.

I say, therefore, that the proposition which is now introduced, and introduced obviously without a particle of knowledge on the part of my friend from Wisconsin, as to the extensiveness of its operation, taking his own words and the Blue Book together for the proof of what I say, has no relation at all to the subject under consideration; and in my judgment it is improper in itself for the reasons which I gave yesterday, and which were given more at large by my friend, the Senator from Maine.

I am not going to spend a great deal of time on this topic; but I will call attention to the state of things in the Post Office Department alone. I find in running over the Blue Book that the list of clerks in the post offices all over this country whose salaries and emoluments amount to more than one thousand dollars a year is over three hundred and thirty, and my friend can count them up as I have—nearly three hundred and fifty.

Mr. HOWE. Do they come under the amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly they do, because they are not departmental clerks, and they are in the service of the Government.

Mr. SUMNER. They are not appointed by the head of a Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The exception in the amendment is simply of clerks in the Departments.

Mr. SUMNER. They are not appointed by the head of a Department, but appointed by the various postmasters.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no; the nominations are sent by the postmasters to the Postmaster General.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are appointed in exactly the same way that the clerks all over the country administering the functions of every one of the other Departments are appointed; that is, the head of the Department here has a controlling voice as to who those clerks shall be. Then, take the custom-houses, if you please; there are hundreds of night-watchmen, whose only necessary quality is that of simple fidelity as a sentinel, whose compensation is more than one thousand dollars a year.

Mr. SUMNER. Are they appointed by the head of a Department?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SUMNER. The night watchmen?

Mr. EDMUNDS. A night watchman and every other employé, except a day laborer, in the custom-house is appointed in that way, provided he is appointed in the way the law requires that he should be. I want to repeat again, for the information of my friends who are plunging this amendment into this bill, that every one of the appointees in the custom-house department of the United States, excepting day laborers—and they have to be authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury in advance—is appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the nomination of the chief officer of the customs at the particular port, wherever it may be. That is what the law says. I do not say that persons are not sometimes appointed in some other way; but we must take it in general that they are appointed in that way. Their name is not legion, to be sure; but they are a very numerous and a very necessary body of public servants.

The great branch of the Government called the Senate would engage in a most dignified and useful occupation, indeed, if it spent its time in endeavoring to settle between the collector of customs at Burlington, Vermont, or at Madison, Wisconsin, if there is a port of entry there, and the Secretary of the Treasury as to who was the best man for a sentinel over a ship that had just come in. The business of the Department would get on famously in that way.

No, Mr. President, it will not bear the test of investigation, and it is put forward, I venture to say with all respect to my friends, as a measure of feeling instead of as a measure of judgment which is founded upon any investigation into the grounds upon which it is to be carried out, or the circumstances which enter into the extent and scope of the amendment itself.

I do not claim, as my friend from Wisconsin very properly states, any patent for this bill which has been reported, or any copyright in it. It is not my bill; it is the bill of my honorable friend from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] somewhat amended, and he does not claim any copyright. But we claim, as Senators having charge of a measure, and being in some degree responsible for the propriety of its details, that gentlemen who have not investigated another branch of the subject which is under consideration elsewhere should not, without a fair statement of reasons in opposition to it, cover it by an amendment which, in the first place, has nothing whatever to do with the bill, and which, in the next place, cannot be under the kind of investigation we are making of it, properly understood, and to which, if it were properly understood, in my judgment, three fourths of the Senate would be opposed.

Mr. HOWE. I rise more to repudiate an imputation thrown out by the Senator from Vermont in the outset of his remarks than for any other purpose. I must protest now and always against the imputation that what I say on this bill or any other is dictated or animated at all by my personal or my political resentments. I have had occasion to disclaim that once or twice before. I know, sir, that I am engaged here in debating a proposed amendment to the law of the land; and I want that law when it is agreed upon, if I like it—I shall like it a little if you pass it as it is; I shall like it better if you put this amendment upon it—I want it to remain on the statute-book, not merely to the end of President Johnson's Administration, but to the end of the Administration that shall succeed his, and all succeeding Administrations. I am legislating for no particular Administration. And I want to say further right here that if I am animated by any resentment at all, which I do not think is the case, it is directed as little toward the President as it is toward myself and those who surround me here. He has done things in the exercise of this prerogative which I think ought not to have been done; but the things he has done we left here at the end of the last session knowing that the authority was in his hands to do; and he had, not our explicit consent to do the particular things, but he had knowledge that we adjourned the law-making power of the Government without taking from him the power to do these things, and we are as much responsible as he is for what he has done. So, then, I am not one who is trying to gratify any resentment I have against the President of the United States.

Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont says it is not the purpose of this bill to say who shall or who shall not be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; it is the purpose of this particular bill to say how those officers who happen to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall be treated after they are appointed, or how they shall be disposed of. Now, if it be the purpose of this bill merely to assert a constitutional principle and not to give it any practical effect whatever, the Senator from Vermont is entirely right; but I do not suppose he would really call upon the Congress of the United States to discuss and deliberate upon a measure which was not intended to have a practical effect. So that when he is trying to assert the right of the Senate to be consulted in the removal of a man who has been appointed with its consent, I suppose he means to throw protection over some actual existing officer; and he would not try to do that if he did not know that there were some officers thus appointed who were liable thus to be removed. Then that is the practical effect that his bill is to have. If that is a beneficial effect, its beneficence will be precisely in proportion to the number of officers who are included within its protection; and if you adopt this amendment the number of officers under its protection will be greater than it is now. They say it will be too great because it will include too many officers. Is that so?

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont undertook to be facetious over the idea—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir, unless I mistook him, he really undertook to be facetious over the idea that the Senate might be caught hereafter in secret session deliberating upon the fitness of a night watchman in some of the custom-houses of the United States. That might be a ludicrous spectacle; but then I wish to console my friend with the reflection that it will be in secret session and nobody will see us but ourselves, and we can stand that. But the point I wished to make was, that whatever officer, be he employed in New York, Burlington, Madison, or elsewhere, is held to be of sufficient importance to the service to pass in review before any tribunal here in the capital of the nation, whether it be the President or the head of a Department, is, in my judgment, of sufficient importance to have the indorsement of the Senate. Let your collectors select all the unimportant officers and be responsible for them; but when you want to dignify an officer so far as to send his name to Washington to pass in review before the Secretary of the Treasury, I object to his being reviewed by him at all. Let him come here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend allow me to ask him how can we, by the Constitution, vest the appointment of these inferior officers in the collectors of customs? The Constitution only gives us authority to vest the appointment of inferior officers in the President, the heads of Departments, or the courts of law. That is the limit of our authority. We cannot therefore authorize a collector of customs, or a local postmaster, or anybody else to appoint an officer who is to execute the laws of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. And yet, Mr. President, practically they do do that; and I heard it asserted by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON] the other day that we could locate the appointment of these officers just where we pleased.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You do not think so.

Mr. HOWE. No, I cannot say that I do think we can locate them where we please; but if the law is defective in that respect we can prevent that effect of it by an amendment to it, if that be your purpose. What we are aiming at is to bring the body of those officers who are made political machines of now before the Senate for their indorsement. That is the purpose at which we are aiming; and I am not to be deterred by being told that the number is very great. If it is very great, as I believe it is not, I say, as I said before, that the necessity for the law is so much greater.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I have abandoned nearly all the political theories of the party into which I was born; but there is some lingering of that sentiment yet remaining in my breast which was the war cry of that party when I first became a voter, and that was, the curtailment of executive patronage and power. I am in favor of this proposition in accordance with that sentiment which I have always entertained, and entertain as strongly to-day as at any past period of my life; but not because of any feeling that I may have against, or any hostility toward, the President of the United States. Personally he has treated me well enough, and I have no complaint to make about it. But here is an opportunity for me to record my vote upon a question which has a tendency in that particular direction, and I propose to record it in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. He proposes that every officer of the United States who receives a salary from the Government exceeding the sum of $1,000 shall be sent to the Senate for confirmation. We now have that law applying to the different postmasters throughout the United States. Why should it not apply to other officers? The answer made to us is that they are too numerous, that we cannot attend to it, and that as the country expands and the population increases the necessity of investing this power exclusively in the President of the United States will be increased. That argument, as has been well said by the Senator from Wisconsin, instead of being in favor of the abandonment of this power on the part of the Senate to pass upon these confirmations, is, in my conviction, a reason why we should insist upon exercising it. I do not care if the nominations sent to us will fill a volume as large as a family Bible; I do not care if you do not pass upon the nominations critically or individually at all; the very fact that you have the right to do it will exercise a restraining influence on the appointing power.

It is said that this will bring before us for confirmation appraisers and deputy collectors. Why should they not be brought before us? Why, sir, the office of appraiser in some of your cities is of vastly more importance than three fourths of the officers we are called upon to pass on. It is important that those appraisers should be men of integrity and character and worth; and who should know that better than the Representatives and Senators from the particular locality whence they are appointed?

It is said, too, that we shall have the assistant assessors and the deputy collectors and the inspectors sent here in this way. Very well; I want them sent here in this way. Do you suppose that if the power of confirmation or rejection had been lodged in the Senate in regard to these inspectors a man would have been appointed from my State as an inspector who only last year was guilty of smuggling cigars, and who condoned his offense by the payment of several thousand dollars? I want the opportunity to put my seal of condemnation upon such men as that; and if there be only one man rejected in a whole State or in the whole United States for having violated your laws, that will have a moral influence and a political influence upon the President and upon others who make appointments.

I know that if this measure passes it will throw great burdens upon your committees. That is no reason why we should not pass the law. Make new committees; organize your committees in a different manner; send some of these nominations that are now all thrust upon a single committee to other committees, and thus you will be able to transact the business.

But the great point with me, and the great advantage in establishing this rule and passing this law is the effect that it will have upon the appointing power in the future and upon the appointees, when they know that they have got to pass the ordeal of the Senate. As I said before, confirm them in gross if you please; but leave to every Senator who knows anything about bad men being appointed an opportunity to select from that list those whom he knows to be unworthy of filling the places to which they have been appointed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask a question of the honorable Senator from Iowa and also of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. Why do they confine this provision to those officers who receive more than one thousand dollars? Why not extend it to every one who receives as much as $100?

Mr. GRIMES. Does the Senator desire an answer?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not draw the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts; but if I had the power to do it I would not limit it to those receiving $1,000. I insist that the appointing power is lodged in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, of every officer, and that we abandon our duty when we confer it entirely upon him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken in supposing that the Constitution says any such thing. The Constitution takes it for granted that this power will not all be lodged in the President. The Constitution says that the President shall appoint all officers except those the appointment of whom may be vested in the heads of Departments or the courts of law; and I would ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts why he does not include the appointees of the Supreme Court; why he confines it to the Departments? I should like an answer if he chooses to give one.

Mr. SUMNER. I did take that case into consideration, and I was governed by the thought that the appointments by the courts, whether the Supreme Court or the circuit courts, were a class by themselves, and I thought that that might be treated of in a separate bill if there should be occasion for it. I was not sure that there was occasion for it, because I was early taught that a court ought to have the appointment of its own officers; and there seemed to be some reasons peculiar to a court why they should have that power. I have not yet abandoned that original teaching with regard to courts, and therefore on this occasion I did not propose to interfere with that; and yet I can see that there may be strong arguments why this provision should extend even to the clerks of courts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, Mr. President, it seems it comes to the same thing. The framers of the Constitution were so unwise and so feeble that they forgot to provide that the President should appoint every officer, and the Senator from Iowa, by way of curtailing his power, gravely argues that the way to do it is to make him appoint every officer. That is the way to curtail his power. And that is the argument of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. The President has not the appointment now of the ten thousand minor officers in the country; give it to him in order to curtail the power that he exercises; frighten him with it.

Mr. GRIMES. He has it indirectly through others.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that he has. If he has it indirectly, he has not got it directly. It is to be put directly in his hands now by this amendment; the President is the man to make these appointments. I wish, says the honorable Senator, to curtail his power; give him, therefore, in order to curtail it, the appointment of from ten to twenty thousand more, and then cut it off. That is a queer way of curtailment. If he has it now indirectly through others, if he chooses to exercise it, or can find time to exercise it, he has not got it directly coming home to himself when every man must make or may make a particular and specific approach to the President for an appointment. I confess that I do not see the efficacy of the remedy.

As to the Supreme Court, I am surprised that my honorable friend from Massachusetts has stuck to any of his original ideas, for since the dissatisfaction that has been expressed in the country at a recent decision or two of the Supreme Court I supposed of course that he would say it would be better to cut them from the appointment of their own clerks and their own minor officers and their own doorkeepers, and all that.

Now, sir, my objection to this legislation, in the first place, is that it is running everything into the ground. But the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has this further difficulty about it, in my judgment. The last clause provides that all officers who have been appointed since July 1, 1866, shall go out of office. Now, why is that? There is no feeling with regard to the exercise of the President's power, not the slightest. There is no feeling on the part of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin with regard to the exercise of the President's power, not a particle. All is calm as a summer's morning. His heart is perfectly free from guile. He is legislating for the great interests of the country for all future time; and so is my honorable friend from Massachusetts. But there is a little clause there that everybody that has been appointed since July 1, 1866, shall go out of office in order that we may have new appointments made, and that they may be sent to the Senate. Although I do not say that this would be improper, it does strike me that it looks a little as if there was something in this amendment beyond merely legislating for future time and setting all things right. I may be mistaken about it, but it has that look at any rate, as if there was some object to be accomplished, some particular thing to be done that has reference not so much to the future as to the past. Sir, in legislating for the country for the future and upon great principles there is danger sometimes that we may let the present animosities and present feeling enter somewhat into our consideration. I will say frankly that while I wish to defend my friends in office and will do everything that an honorable man and a Senator can do to keep them in office, so far as they are worthy, I do not think that the great object for which the Constitution was framed was to parcel out offices to our friends and keep them there; and in my judgment any legislation which looks as if we were directing our attention to that particular thing with reference to individuals in office at the present time, or who may be in the future, appears as if we were thinking not so much of the country as of particular purposes of our own.

Now, sir, I do not approve, I utterly and entirely disapprove, without reservation, of the action of the President in removing so many men from office from among those who helped to elect him, simply because they did not choose to support his policy as against Congress in a matter which belonged to Congress and not to him. I say it here openly, so that my position may not be misunderstood. I do not approve, and I disapprove the whole thing. It meets my condemnation. That the President has had occasion to remove some men from office and appoint others for good reasons I have no doubt. That in many cases when a term of office expires it may be proper (and this President has as much right to do it as any other) to appoint somebody else in the place of the previous incumbent is well enough. All that may be. It is an exercise of power that belongs to him. Nobody has a right to an office to keep it forever. But the avowal of the principle by the President or the head of a Department (and it has been done I think somewhat rashly, to say the least of it,) that men were to be removed from office and others appointed because they supported the President with regard to a policy upon a question which did not belong to him but belonged to the Congress of the United States, is, in my judgment, utterly unjustifiable.

But, sir, while I say this, I do not think it necessary on account of this temporary emergency, this particular position in which we happen to be placed at the present time, to direct our legislation and spend our time so much with reference to curtailing executive power in the direction in which it always has been exercised. That we have this difficulty with the President is unfortunate. We must take the consequences of it to a certain extent. We shall not better it by legislation such as is proposed in the last clause of the Senator's amendment, that everybody whom the President has happened to appoint since last July shall be turned out of office in order to have a new appointment made to be sent to the Senate. Why not go back to a period anterior to that and apply it to all who have been appointed since the present Executive assumed power or became the President of the United States? I think it is unwise; I think it has not a good effect upon the country; I think it has not a good effect upon public opinion; I do not believe it tends to elevate us if we spend so much time upon a matter which is comparatively so unimportant.

I say, as I said before, so far as this subject of appointments to office is concerned, I should be perfectly willing to leave it where it was and take the consequences, had not the President interfered, as he did interfere, under the advice perhaps—I should say the bad advice—as I am told (I have never seen the opinion) of the Attorney General as to what he might do with regard to men rejected by the Senate. There comes a point where we are obliged to stand upon our rights and upon our constitutional duty. But what do gentlemen propose? In addition to that which I admit to be necessary, and which I am disposed to stand by, as I avowed in advance I would be if the contingency occurred, what do gentlemen propose? They propose to take up the Blue Book and go through it, and say that the appointment of every officer they find there, and if there are any outside of that whose names are not in the Blue Book all others whose salaries amount to $1,000 shall go, for the sake of curtailing the President's power, directly into the hands of the President himself, and out of the hands of the Secretaries who now make them. I asked one Senator the question—the other was not in the Chamber at the moment—to answer me, why stop at $1,000? There is no limit on the principle upon which this is advocated, a principle not recognized by the Constitution, because the Constitution expressly provides for these inferior officers in another way. Senators must go further. They must go down to the very bottom. Why not? Every man who is in office has his degree of influence. Why should we not scrutinize him? Every tide-waiter can exercise political influence. It is put upon that ground. We now, says the Senator, confirm all postmasters whose salary exceeds $1,000 a year. What is the reason of the limitation? Not that they exercised political power, but that they were important officers, for the reason that they received that amount of salary. Why did it not go lower? On account of the inconvenience of the thing. Let me tell you your important postmasters in important places do not exercise one twentieth part of the political influence as a general rule that your petty postmasters in country villages do, and are not so important men, comparatively, compared with the population that there is about them. They are a different class of men altogether as a general rule. Why not go to the bottom, then, and take the whole upon the same ground? The answer would be evident. You cannot do it; the thing is too inconvenient; it is too burdensome. All the petty postmasters cannot be appointed by the President. The Senator from Massachusetts says they may be counted. The hairs upon his head may be counted; but I reckon it would take him some considerable time to do it; it would be something of a job, because his head happens to be well covered.

Well, sir, the same argument precisely applies to these other offices. I was looking over the Blue Book, and the list of offices in the customs and other branches of the Treasury Department alone occupies seventy pages of the Blue Book, and perhaps one out of fifty of them, certainly not more than one out of twenty, is a man who is now nominated to the Senate and confirmed; the rest are not. Senators say this is a great power. Unquestionably it is; but power must be exercised by somebody; confidence must be placed in somebody. The heads of Departments are selected by the Constitution as the proper persons with whom to deposit this power of appointment. Why? Not simply because the men themselves may be understood to know, but because it is necessary that they should have the control of their own Departments, and because they are supposed from their communication with those under them and their agents to know more of the proper men to be placed in such offices than the President can know, and better able to exercise that power. That is the logic of the thing.

The appointment of men to minor offices has gone on precisely in that way from the very necessity of the case ever since the foundation of the Government. What evil has followed? None that has been complained of. Nobody has complained to this day that by depriving the President of the direct power of appointment of so many men his power has been increased, and that the way to diminish it is to say to him, "You shall appoint all of them." Well, you might diminish it by that means, but it would be in this way: you would impose upon him a duty that he could not possibly perform; he would not be able to decide upon the hundredth part of the cases that came before him, and certainly he would not be able to do anything else if he considered them at all. Therefore, sir, I object to this proposition again because I consider it utterly unwise. I see no occasion, from the temporary evils under which we are laboring to change a system which has been so long established, to utterly ignore all the experience of the past, and to take from the places where the founders of the Government deposited it a power of this description, and where it has continued through so many Administrations and been exercised without complaint from anybody, simply for the purpose of taking it here in order that finally we may have a negative, if we choose to exercise it, upon these petty appointments, which are well enough made as they are now.

There is another thing. Adopt this amendment here, and what is the consequence? The provisions of the bill of the honorable Senator from Vermont apply to it, and not one man in all the custom-house offices in this country; not one man of all the men connected with the internal revenue; not one man in any department, whatever and wherever he may be, in the transaction of ordinary business, can be removed during the recess of Congress. If an inspector is unfit for his place you cannot remove him. If a weigher or gauger is unfit you cannot remove him. If an assistant assessor is unfit you cannot remove him. He may be suspended by the President, and at the next session of Congress we are to have the reasons given and the name sent in to us for the removal of a tide-waiter or something of that sort. Why, sir, you could not, without increasing the force of your Printing Office, print the number of cases that would happen under such a regulation as that. These officers are continually being changed. Some die; some are found dishonest; some are found unfit for their duty. One reason or another may render it necessary to turn them out and put somebody else in their places. It is every day's experience in the Treasury Department. A day does not pass there, from the beginning to the end of the year hardly, in which the Secretary of the Treasury does not have occasion to appoint some new officer and to remove some old one. Is all that to be suspended and hung up during the recess of Congress and until Congress comes together again, and then are we to have the reasons for it given to us? Sir, in my judgment the whole idea is an absurdity. I beg pardon of gentlemen for so characterizing it, but it looks to me like an absurdity and nothing else to try to ingraft this amendment upon a bill of this description, or upon any bill.

Mr. COWAN. I rise, sir, merely to correct what seems to be a misapprehension of honorable Senators as to the number of persons removed by the President during the past year. In the debate the day before yesterday the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and I am sorry he is not in his seat, made this statement:

"Mr. SHERMAN said the bill contemplated nothing that was unconstitutional. It simply asserted the right of the Senate to a share in the appointing power, as provided in the Constitution. The opponents of the bill had characterized it as revolutionary. He could see nothing revolutionary in it. He agreed that it was important to guard against the contingency of a vacancy in office, but he believed this bill did so. If Mr. HENDRICKS' amendment was adopted, he feared the President would continue to reappoint men who had been rejected by the Senate. Of the two thousand removals made by the President since last summer not one hundred had yet been reported to the Senate. If the amendment of Mr. HENDRICKS were adopted, the President would continue to withhold these names, and reappoint them after the adjournment. In several cases the President had reappointed men rejected by the Senate. This was the case with the postmaster at St. Louis, and with the collector at Philadelphia and internal revenue officers elsewhere. If he [Mr. SHERMAN] believed the President would try to harmonize with the Senate, and send in other names after his nominees had been rejected, he would be willing to let him fill vacancies during the recess; but the President had manifested no such disposition."

Now, sir, it appears upon an examination that the whole number of offices within the gift of the President amounts to two thousand four hundred and thirty-four. He has that number of appointments; and the whole number of removals amount to four hundred forty-six. I mean civil offices. I suppose it will not be contended here that there is any especial virtue in a simple majority which entitles it to the offices. No man can give any reason why three hundred thousand voters in a State should have all the offices in the State while two hundred and ninety-five thousand voters in that State have no offices at all. Not even those who assail the President most sternly and unrelentingly I think will argue that there is any justice and any propriety in that. If these offices belong to anybody and for any other purpose than the public service itself, and if there is to be any rule adopted for the guidance of the appointing power, perhaps that practice is just as good as any other; but the minority would be entitled to its share as well. Now, I suppose it is fair enough to assume that at the commencement of last year these two thousand four hundred and thirty-four officers were all members of the dominant party.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator has stated the number of civil offices in the gift of the President. Perhaps he may be able to inform the Senate of the number in the gift of the Secretary of the Treasury. If so, I would be happy if he would inform us.

Mr. COWAN. I think I can. I will come to that directly. I have that, too.

Then assuming, I say, that the incumbents of the offices at the beginning of the last year were members of the dominant party, the question is whether it was not an abuse of power previously exercised to confer upon them all the offices of the country to the exclusion of the entire rights of the minority. I think it is more than likely that in that quarter the abuse will be likely to be found, not in the rectification of that error which has been occasioned by the removals made recently by the President, because he has not as yet given to the minority anything like their fair share of this "spoil" and "plunder," as it is sometimes called. But of the four hundred and forty-six persons removed, I will venture to state that four hundred of those put in their places, four hundred of the incoming officers, are also members of this dominant party, men who voted for the President, who voted along with the majority of the Senate, but who happened to differ afterward upon a question of policy, of expediency, or, if you please, of constitutional law.

I think I may say I know something about how these removals were made, some of them, and why they were made. I have no difficulty in standing here in my place and saying that all the removals that I know to have been made by the President were of men who had no respect not only for the Chief Magistrate of the nation, not only for the nation itself, but, I thought, for themselves. Senators are certainly aware that within the last year a great deal of exceedingly offensive, gross, unwarranted language has been made use of toward the President of the United States. I am satisfied that there is not an honorable Senator here who would not say that where an officeholder, for whose conduct the President was responsible, was guilty of that kind of improper language and want of respect to his superior officer, he should be removed. I do not know a single case where an officer was removed who conducted himself with a reasonable degree of propriety and decency toward the President. I know some who have been removed who came to the President and professed a great deal of friendship for him and a great deal of enmity and hostility against those who opposed him, and I know that afterward, when they found the current was running the other way, they proved false to their promises and treacherous—first treacherous to you; next, treacherous to the President. I suppose a man who will tell a lie, who will be guilty of even a political fraud, ought not to be endowed with an office and kept in it perpetually.

One word now with regard to the postmaster at St. Louis. It will be understood that the postmaster at St. Louis had been the postmaster there for four years before his nomination was sent again to the Senate, and if he was sent in again after having been rejected it was because it was thought that the Senate acted under a misapprehension of the case. With regard to the collector in Philadelphia, we all know how that was. In that case the appointee, I believe, was twice confirmed and twice rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Who was that?

Mr. COWAN. Sloanaker. He was twice confirmed and twice rejected, and I know that a very considerable number of Senators belonging to the dominant party were exceedingly anxious that he should be reappointed again, notwithstanding the rejection. I agree with the honorable Senator from Maine, as I have stated on the floor, that, in my judgment, it is against the spirit of the Constitution to reappoint the same person to the same office after he has been once rejected by the Senate; yet I do not look upon that as imperatively the rule. I should never do it unless I was satisfied that a wrong had been done to the appointee by the Senate without being properly informed. But, sir, it is equally clear that the effect of this rejection does not last forever. If a man should be appointed collector for the port of New York at this session and rejected by the Senate and nominated ten years afterward, nobody would pretend that that rejection would disqualify him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He may be nominated at the very next session; but he should not be appointed during the recess after having been rejected.

Mr. COWAN. Well, if the effect of the rejection is simply to continue during the recess, then it is divested of its difficulties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He ought not to be put in again without the assent of the Senate.

Mr. COWAN. I am not prepared to say that I would agree to a distinction of that kind, to so define the power and limit it, because I have had my mind made up on that subject for twenty years. I had occasion twenty years ago to look that question directly in the face; and although I could not say it was bad law, I did think it was a discourtesy to the coördinate body and an improper exercise of the appointing power.

As I see my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in his seat now, I beg to call his attention to another thing. It was stated by him that "of the two thousand removals made, not one hundred had been sent in to the Senate." The number that has been sent in is three hundred and fifty-seven, and I believe the Senate have acted upon but five. I do not think that my honorable friend desired to exaggerate about this matter and I have no idea that he was desirous still further to disturb the state of feeling now existing in the country by putting things in a worse light than they really are; but that is the fact. Four hundred and forty-six removals out of twenty-four hundred have been made; three hundred and fifty-seven of those have been sent to the Senate, and five of them have been disposed of by the Senate. Now, sir, it is unquestionably unjust to complain of the President, that he has not sent all these names into the Senate, when he is ahead this session three hundred and fifty-two appointments now, and they are not yet acted upon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator if that includes military appointments?

Mr. COWAN. Oh, no, civil appointments; and I will state the number of removals that have been made in the different Departments, as I have taken the trouble to get the information on that subject. In the Department of State there are three hundred and forty appointments, and there have been ten new ones made. In the Treasury Department there are nine hundred and seventy-three appointments, and there have been one hundred and ninety-nine changes. In the Department of the Interior there are two hundred and ten appointments, and there have been twenty-one changes. In the Post Office Department there are seven hundred and nine appointments, and there have been one hundred and ninety-seven changes. In the office of the Attorney General there are two hundred and two appointments, and there have been nineteen changes.

Mr. GRIMES. What do you mean by "appointments?"

Mr. COWAN. Presidential appointments. Now, sir, there is the sum and substance of all this matter, and what does it amount to? What is there alarming in it? Nothing alarming to anybody except to somebody who is afraid of being turned out of office; that is all.

Then the question rises, how long are these people to remain in office? Is any dominant party in this country willing to put itself upon the ground that they once in, shall remain and continue in? I am very free to say that if I understand the feeling of the American people, it is directly against that system of perpetuating one man in office. It has been said here that the ballot educates; we ought to give the ballot to men and women to educate them. It is clear that offices educate, too, and hence the old doctrine of rotation in office. One of the merits of this Government is, that the offices are within the reach of every man; but if when a party gets in and gets control of the offices, gets a dominant majority, they determine that the President shall not remove unless with their consent, what is that but saying, "We have the key in our hands and will lock the door and keep ourselves in and every one else out."

Again, sir, a large number of officers were appointed in 1861, when the Administration of Mr. Lincoln came in. I believe the outgoing party did not grumble a great deal about it. It was what they expected and what everybody expected. It was only carrying out the doctrine of rotation on a great scale. So they went out with a good grace and others came in. In the meanwhile, however, a new state of affairs took place in the country. We have had a terrible war. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of men abandoned their business, their homes, and their means of livelihood, and they went out in defense of the Government and its Constitution and laws. They have come home. Are they not entitled to some consideration at the hands of the Executive? Take a civilian who during the war sat at home in his office; a good officer—I have nothing to say about that; I suppose that to be true—doing his duties well, receiving from one to ten thousand dollars a year for it, who has had his office for five years. Is there any very great hardship in saying to him, "Sir, you have had your turn; offices here are not to be hereditary; they do not belong to anybody by divine or especial right; you must go out, and here is a soldier with one leg well qualified to do the duty, and he has a right to have his turn." In a great many instances such men have been rewarded. I think that wherever they could be found well qualified they were appointed, not altogether because civilians were not entitled to their share and soldiers were the whole people; but they were entitled to their share, and it was the only way they could receive that recognition at the hands of the President.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Were not soldiers dismissed to make room for civilians?

Mr. COWAN. I have heard that statement, but I do not know of a single case where a good soldier who was qualified to perform the duties of the office and could give the proper securities was displaced. I knew of one case where a very worthy man was in an office, but unfortunately his securities were not such as to recommend him to the appointing power, and I think they would not have recommended him to the Senate, and a civilian was put in his place; but as a general rule wherever a soldier could be found who was qualified to perform the duties of the office and fill its functions he was favored.

Mr. President, I cannot hope to say so well as the honorable Senator from Maine has just said, what are the reasons against this proposition. I would not dare to attempt the task of gilding his gold and painting his lily; but I must be allowed to say that I think his words were wise, eminently wise, eminently good, eminently adapted to pour oil upon the surface of these troubled waters, and I should be glad if willing ears were lent to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I certainly did not wish to do any injustice to the President of the United States or to those who control the appointment of civil officers. I am somewhat surprised at the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that but four hundred and sixty changes have been made. If that be so I can only state that the rule which seems to have been observed elsewhere has not been observed in Ohio. My impression is that, every leading office-holder in the State of Ohio received a polite notice that if he did not attend the Philadelphia convention, or did not approve of the call of the Philadelphia convention, he should promptly communicate that fact to a self-constituted committee in this city, composed of men very high in official position. Circulars of that kind were sent all over the United States I am informed. They certainly were sent to the office-holders in the State of Ohio. They were called upon to contribute money to support a new party in antagonism to the party that brought the President into power and to which they were attached. If I am not mistaken, the name of at least one member of this body was used in that circular, and some of those circulars were issued in the name of a Cabinet officer and were distributed all over the country. I know very well that those who did not reply satisfactorily to this peculiar mode of interrogation were soon after removed from office.

The Senator says that but a small portion out of the great number of officers have been removed. I can only speak for my own State. Nearly every prominent office-holder in the State of Ohio was removed, and in nearly every case for political reasons. The attorneys and marshals of both the northern and southern districts were removed, although in one case the attorney resigned in anticipation of removal. A majority of the collectors and assessors of internal revenue were removed, and I know in some cases they were not removed either because they were guilty of using uncivil language in regard to the President, or because they were guilty of misconduct. In the northern district the removals were made of men who had just been confirmed by the Senate; who were entirely unexceptionable to the whole people among whom they lived; who had faithfully discharged the duties of their offices. In some cases the incumbents had only held their offices for one year. They were removed for political reasons, and partisans of the new party were appointed in their place. There can be no doubt of this. I know also that in many of the congressional districts self-constituted committees were organized to supervise the distribution of the Federal patronage in portions of the State, and that appointments and removals were made upon those political recommendations; that Democratic candidates for Congress running against the organization that elected the President controlled all the patronage within their districts; and that postmasters were appointed and removed upon their recommendation.

The Senator from Pennsylvania says that but four hundred and sixty removals were made out of about twenty-six hundred presidential appointments, if I understand him correctly. Then, sir, Ohio has been very unfortunate, because I can scarcely recall a single prominent officer in that State who was not removed. It is true that many of the postmasters were allowed to remain, but not all of them. In one case I know of, and about which I have received so many remonstrances, a Democratic editor, who had been a violent Copperhead during the war, and who did all he could to encourage the rebels, although living safely in the State of Ohio, and who weekly was publishing articles intended to excite insurrection and controversy in the State, was appointed to a post office of great importance in that State.

Under these circumstances I think we had a right to complain. In regard to the delay in sending these appointments to the Senate I have been overwhelmed, as most Senators have been, with remonstrances and papers in relation to them. I say that these nominations ought to have been communicated to the Senate within ten days after we met, or at least within a reasonable time. Up to this hour scarcely a nomination made in the State of Ohio during the recess has been communicated to this body. Perhaps I ought not to state more than this, because these communications are made to the Senate in executive session; but as the nominations when made are matters of public notoriety—

Mr. JOHNSON. You can state what has not been done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can state then, in a single word, that but one of all these nominations, about which there is so much feeling and controversy in the State of Ohio, has been sent to the Senate. My colleague will know whether I am correct or not.

Mr. WADE. I know of none.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the very day on which I made the remark in regard to the sending these nominations to the Senate the great body of the nominations to which the Senator alludes were sent to the Senate. The assessors and collectors for Pennsylvania and some of the eastern States were sent us; but up to this hour none of the nominations for the State which I in part represent have been sent to the Senate. Under these circumstances I think I was justified in making the criticism upon the conduct of the President that I did.

I certainly have no unkind feelings to the President; but I do think, as he was elected by a political party to the office under which he became President of the United States, that he had no right to regard the political divisions that might arise in the course of his administration to operate upon him as a reason for turning men out of office. They merely differed with him on questions as they arose; and yet in many cases in the State of Ohio there could be no other reason assigned for these removals except political reasons. It was not pretended in that State that they were removed for any other cause. On the contrary, I know of cases where officers have been removed who now hold in their hands letters from the heads of Departments, who must have concurred in their removal, certifying that they were not removed for any cause except for political reasons; that they had discharged the duties of their offices ably and well; and entirely disproving the allegation now made that these removals were made merely because the incumbents had held the office for four or five years, and there ought to be a rotation in office, or that they had abused the President or the like of that. I do not wish to go into particular cases, because this is not the proper place to discuss them; but I can say without fear of contradiction that I could name many of these officers who were removed without the least pretense that they were guilty of any incivility to the President or of any want of care in their offices. Some of them were removed although they had held their offices but for one year, having been appointed by President Lincoln and confirmed by the Senate; and in some cases men who were appointed by President Johnson himself, and whose nominations were confirmed by the Senate, were after the adjournment of Congress removed for political reasons.

Under these circumstances I think it is the duty of the Government to guard against these removals for mere political reasons. As I said the other day in the few remarks that I made on the subject, I see nothing in the bill now before us that is not justified by the counsels of the fathers and of all who preceded us in our office of Senators. If I understand the bill, all it provides for is that a person duly appointed to office, by the appointment of the President and the sanction of the Senate, shall hold his office until his successor shall be appointed, and that no person who is thus appointed with the sanction of the Senate shall be removed from his office until the Senate and the President concur in his successor. That is the whole scope and purpose of the bill, and if it is confined to that I certainly shall support it with great pleasure.

When my friend from Massachusetts offered his amendment the other day to the bill in regard to pension agents I voted against it, and when it is now renewed on this bill I shall vote against it. The reason is, that it extends to a multitude of officers, the appointment of whom ought to be left with the heads of Departments. But there are classes of officers that he does include in his amendment whose nominations ought to be sent to the Senate. For instance, there is a class of revenue agents, whose pay amounts in some cases to from twenty-five hundred to three thousand dollars, and who are among the most responsible officers in the Treasury Department. Under the law when they were appointed they were not deemed very important, and they were therefore not directed to be sent to the Senate. I think they ought to be. So in the case of post office agents, men who receive from two to five thousand dollars per annum, and who are the right hand, you may say, of the Post Office Department. Their nominations are not now sent to the Senate, but they ought to be.

While I am speaking of removals, I will mention one that was made in the Post Office Department. The post office agent for the northwestern States, holding the most important agency under the Post Office Department, a man conceded by all, conceded by Postmasters General Blair and Dennison, and even by the present incumbent, to be a man in every respect fitted for the office, was turned out of office during the last vacation for political reasons, because he would not participate in the Philadelphia convention and join his fate and his fortunes to the new party; and a man was appointed in his place who had been previously in a subordinate position in the Post Office Department and turned out. This is a prominent case. I merely speak of these cases to show that these removals have been made for political reasons. In the case I have mentioned the nomination has not been and need not be sent to us at all, although the office is one of the most important in the Post Office Department.

If the Senator from Massachusetts will confine his amendment to offices of sufficient importance to excite the attention of the Senate I shall vote for it with great pleasure. As it now stands, it extends to all the assistant assessors, about whom we can have no information; it extends to all the custom-house officers in the city of New York; it extends to the weighers there. There is not one of them whose compensation is not $1,000. It extends to the inspectors of distilleries. At the last session their compensation was increased to four dollars a day. So that every inspector of customs will have to be sent to us under the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. The pay of the weighers and gaugers was raised, I think, to $2,000 a year, and they will have to be sent here for confirmation. A multitude of small officers, who are the mere agents of their principals, who have no power except simply as deputies to a principal who is sent to us, would be required by his amendment to be sent to the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Are those persons appointed by the head of a Department?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. I think not according to law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, according to law. The Senator was probably not aware of the fact. When the revenue law was first passed all these subordinates were left to be appointed by the assessor or collector of the district; but it was thought that it would be better to have the whole of them sent to the head of a Department. Under the Constitution we could not invest the head of a bureau with the power to appoint assistant collectors and assistant assessors. It would have been a better practice to leave all these minor appointments to the head of the Internal Revenue Bureau; but as by the Constitution the appointing power must be invested in the President of the United States, or in the heads of Departments, or in the courts of law, it was found necessary either to leave these subordinate officers to be named by the collector and assessor without any reference to the Departments here at Washington, or to invest their appointment in the Secretary of the Treasury, who was the head of the Department. So the law of 1864, under which all these appointments were made, expressly requires them to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury. By the common habit, the assessor designates his own assistant assessors, and they are sent to the Secretary of the Treasury to be approved by him, and usually it is a mere matter of form.

I see no object in having our files cumbered with the names of all these small, subordinate officers who hold their office at the pleasure, substantially, of an officer who is submitted to us. If the amendment were confined to officers of sufficient importance to be aimed at as holding political positions, or whose offices are sought for political purposes, then I think it ought to be adopted. There are a number of post office agents who ought to be sent here for confirmation; there are a large number of revenue agents who ought to be sent here; and quite a number in other Departments who are not now sent here ought to be; but that can be accomplished very easily by a change of the law regulating their appointment. If the Senator desires the post office agents to be sent here, he can very readily move an amendment covering them on the post office appropriation bill or any proper bill that is pending in the Senate; but it seems to me it would be a public inconvenience and a matter of no practical utility to require the multitude of minor officers I have named to be sent to the Senate. By overwhelming our table with a multitude of appointments it would probably only make us disregard those more important ones that ought to demand our attention.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the question of the President's power to remove is not perhaps involved in the particular amendment. I rise, therefore, not for the purpose of discussing that question nor to say anything upon the propriety of the particular amendment, but merely to make good what I stated to be a fact, as I thought very accurately within my recollection that the opinion which Mr. Hamilton expressed in a number of the Federalist, to which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] referred the other day, that the power to remove could only be exerted in conjunction with the Senate, was afterward changed by him. At the moment I did not recollect where I had seen it; but that I had seen it I was perfectly satisfied. I find, as evidence of that, a letter from Mr. Madison, dated the 10th of January, 1832, to Mr. W. C. Rives, in the concluding portion of which he says:

"The authority of Colonel Hamilton, I observe, is cited against the power in question."

He is speaking of the power of removal.

"If his language in the Federalist was so intended, which is not probable, he must have changed his opinion at a very early day, as is proved by his official reports, which go into the opposite extreme. Such a change, if real, would not, indeed, be without his own example. In the Federalist he had so explained the removal from office as to deny the power to the President. In an edition of the work at New York there was a marginal note to the passage that 'Mr. H. had changed his view of the Constitution on that point.'"

That is the authority to which I referred as proving that the alleged opinion which he entertained on the subject was subsequently altered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not prepared to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts at the present moment, and would not like to vote for it without having it thoroughly considered; but while this subject is under consideration, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of inquiry which I had the honor to present in the early part of the session in reference to removals that had been made in the Norfolk navy-yard. I need only read it in order to condemn it, and in order to insure its condemnation by every Senator.

I do not know to what extent these removals have been made by the Secretaries, because I have not inquired into the subject. I presume that the figures presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] who seems to have devoted considerable attention to the subject, are perhaps correct.

I do not know to what extent the President himself has exercised this power of removal; but notwithstanding a contrary practice has existed from the foundation of the Government to the present time, I have my opinion clear upon the subject that the President has no power in the vacation of the Senate to remove an officer and to substitute another in his stead. Others, however, believe that he has the power. If it be true that he possesses that power, then of course the Senate may not have any control over appointments at all. If the President can remove an officer after we adjourn, and the officer appointed by him under the Constitution may, as he no doubt can, retain his commission until the last day of the next session of the Senate, immediately when we adjourn then the President can reappoint that party or somebody else, and that commission will last until the last day of the next session, and immediately thereupon the President may make another appointment, and so on to the end, and in that way the Senate is deprived of any advising power at all. Sir, that never was the intention of the Constitution; it never was the intention of those who framed it. If by some casualty, the President having nothing to do with it, a vacancy occurs in an office during the recess of the Senate, the President can fill it, and that commission will extend until the last day of the next session; but beyond that the President has no power of removing officers and filling the vacancies that he himself makes. I undertake to say that he has no authority—

Mr. McDUGALL. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. McDUGALL. Suppose that a postmaster should be guilty of a felony by abstracting $5,000 from the post office during the recess of Congress, where then would be the authority to displace him and appoint some competent man?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have not any question about the authority of the legislative power to confer upon the President the power of suspending or removing officers; but the difficulty presented in the question of the Senator from California is, that according to the previous practice of the Government, we have left the power of removal to the President, and never thought it necessary to regulate it at all. We have always claimed it, but we have never claimed it by an act of Congress. I undertake to say that if gentlemen will refer back to the history of the Senate in its contests with the President, they will find that the Senate has always differed with the President; but we never could get legislation on the subject.

During the whole time of the controversy with General Jackson the Senate was opposed to him, and passed a resolution condemning his act in removing the deposits from the United States Bank. The Senate at that time took direct issue with General Jackson upon his power of removing Mr. Duane and appointing Mr. Taney, who was afterward Chief Justice. The original resolutions introduced by Mr. Clay condemned it upon the ground that no such power existed in the President. It was condemned by the Senate in 1813, when Mr. Madison undertook to appoint commissioners to negotiate a peace with Great Britain. It will be recollected that the Senate took issue with him on that subject, and said he had no authority whatever to make those appointments without consulting the Senate. It has been at all times contested on the part of the Senate, and when the majority in the Senate has been adverse to the political policy pursued by the President they have never failed to protest against the exercise of this power by the President alone; but generally, as was the case when the Senate was protesting against the conduct of General Jackson, the House of Representatives was with him, and it was an utter impossibility to get any legislation on the subject. I do not suppose that any gentleman who has argued the question—I do not suppose that the Senator from Maryland or any other lawyer—will take the ground that under the Constitution the President has the right to make these appointments without consulting the Senate at all, or that he can make removals in the vacation and Congress have no power to regulate them.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not take that ground.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not. I apprehend nobody denies the power of Congress to regulate it. The difficulty, I will suggest to the Senator from California, is that we have always left this question to the President; we have never regulated it by law. We have always supposed that when an officer commits a wrong, a crime, the President may remove him. We have conceded that power to him. But now, as I understand, the Senate and House of Representatives have gone to work to regulate this power of appointment, and instead of removing absolutely we give to the President the power merely of suspending an officer.

Mr. McDUGALL. If the Senator will allow me, not designing to interrupt the course of his argument, I desire to say a word, as I do not purpose to enter into the discussion myself. The reason why that doctrine was held was, that it was necessary that Government should be capable for all its immediate exigencies.

cies; that executive and legislative and judicial powers should exist for all proper purposes; that the business of taking charge of offices rested with the Executive, and in the absence of Congress, when Congress could not act, there was no other power except the executive power, and ex necessitate it fell to the executive branch of the Government. It was so held because it was a necessary fundamental law for the purpose of an established Government, and belongs to the foundation of law. It was necessary that there should be power somewhere to rectify an evil which might exist in the Government. It was necessary, when an officer acting on the part of the Government should commit a crime, that some power should exist to put him out of authority and substitute some other person in his place who would endeavor to maintain the rights of the Government. That necessary rule of law, fundamental law, necessary law, obtained and became the rule, because its necessity was found in the early days of the Republic; and it is a necessity now, and it is that necessity that has made the rule.

Mr. HENDERSON. When I rose I arose merely for the purpose of reading an extract from a letter of the Secretary of the Navy and to condemn the doctrine that the Secretary lays down in it. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] will find that it is not altogether the merit of the office-holder that controls these appointments. It may be that the President is too well served; and I apprehend that that is so in this case. I have no ill-feeling against the President. My impression is that his Secretaries undertake to serve him better than he desires; and I think that the President himself in his appointments has not carried political persecution to the extent that some of those holding office under him have done.

Some complaints were made some time since at the Norfolk navy-yard about removals, and I knew myself that some of the most worthy men there had been removed for no other cause than that their political sentiments did not agree with those of the Secretary of the Navy. I offered a resolution in the early part of the session, which was adopted, making some inquiry into the matter and asking for the correspondence on the subject. The Secretary sends in this correspondence, and he sends with it a letter dated October 20, 1866, addressed by himself to Rear Admiral S. C. Rowan, commandant of the navy-yard at Norfolk; and I will read to the Senate the qualifications that he lays down to his officer in charge of the various departments of the Norfolk navy-yard for office. He says, speaking of the persons to be appointed:

"Whatever their merits in other respects, disloyalists are not to be employed. It has not been the policy of this Department to give countenance or encouragement to disunionists of any description. Those who oppose the Government in its efforts to establish national amity, whether claiming that States have the right to voluntarily withdraw from the Union by secession, or striving by arbitrary and undelegated power to exclude States from the Union, and deprive them of their guaranteed constitutional rights, are not deemed worthy of service in the Union which they oppose and by the Government which they would subvert."

Mr. SUMNER. Who signs that letter?

Mr. HENDERSON. It is signed "G. Welles, Secretary of the Navy." Now, sir, when you come to the Norfolk navy-yard, who can be appointed under this letter? Those parties who agree with Congress, who believe that the rebellious States ought not immediately to be admitted, are termed by the Secretary of the Navy "disunionists;" they are "disloyalists." He goes on to explain what he means by "disunionists."

He says that any person who is opposed to the immediate admission of these States and the admission of their representatives into both branches of Congress is a disunionist, and those men it is not the policy of the President to appoint. Now, when he comes to talk about disunionists on the other side, how does he define them? Not those parties who fought in the ~~confederate~~ armies; not those men who were the faithful adherents of General Lee and Jefferson Davis. They may be appointed. See how it is qualified:

"Those who oppose the Government in its efforts to establish national amity, whether claiming that States have the right to voluntarily withdraw from the Union by secession"—

Why, sir, I suppose that not more than one third of the southern people at the time of the rebellion in 1861 advocated secession as a constitutional right. They only resorted to rebellion as a revolutionary right. They did not claim it as a constitutional right. The Secretary of the Navy only excludes on the southern side of the question those men who claimed that secession was a constitutional remedy; all others can be appointed at Norfolk. An individual offers himself there for employment. The question is not "Did you serve in the confederate armies?" not "Were you a soldier in Lee's army or Johnston's army?" because such a man may be perfectly competent under this instruction; but the question is, "Do you believe in secession as a constitutional right?" "I do not," says the applicant. "You, sir, can be employed; I will receive you in the Norfolk navy-yard." Another individual offers himself, and he is asked, "Are you in favor of the immediate admission of members of Congress from the seceded States?" He answers, "I am not." Then he is told "You are a disloyalist; you are a disunionist; you must leave; you cannot get employment here."

I do not like this sort of dealing with Union men, men who have stood by the Government during the late difficulty. It may possibly be that the Senator from Pennsylvania is correct in his view that the President has not carried the matter to this extreme; but I show you that the Secretary of the Navy has done it, and he sends us his letter of instruction written in October last. I do not know whether other Secretaries have carried it to this extent or not. I suppose they would frankly send in the instructions they have issued to the heads of bureaus upon this subject. I have no personal knowledge of the matter except that in this case a friend of mine was unjustifiably removed at the Norfolk navy-yard; and not only that, he was supplanted by a person who was not qualified and who was, as I understand, disloyal heretofore. I know him to have been a loyal man. I know him to have been and to be now an upright and honest man, devoted to the best interests of the Government and as capable in his position as any man that could have been employed; but he was discharged under these instructions and another person put in his stead. That fact is unquestionable.

I have no ill feeling; I have no revengeful feeling or spite to gratify against the southern people. I desire to see these difficulties healed up as soon as possible. I do not persecute them; I never have done so; I do not intend to do so. I have no ill feeling against the heads of Departments or the President; but I do think that the Senate has been treated in an improper manner in regard to its share of the appointing power. While I am up, I will say that at the last session of Congress I was exceedingly anxious to get a bill of this sort passed. I not only wanted to curb the power of Mr. Johnson, but the power of all succeeding Presidents. It is no more important in Mr. Johnson's case than it will be in the case of the President who succeeds him. The present system is demoralizing and corrupting. Do we not know it? Do we not feel it? Do not men go to the President to get appointments, pledging the President that they are with him, and then come before us and leave us to infer, either by direct expressions to that effect or by innuendo, that they are sustaining and upholding the policy of Congress. Therefore I say that it is demoralizing; it will ever be; and there are now too many offices in this country to be entirely controlled by one man.

One good reason in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is, that we propose in this measure to leave the heads of Departments entirely under the control of the President, and not to require the sanction of the Senate for their removal. Under this bill the President may remove the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, or any head of a Department, and we should have no control over it, and through them he could do as General Jackson did in order to effect the removal of the deposits; it is a very easy matter. Mr. Duane refused to remove them; Judge Taney was willing to do it; the first was removed and the latter put in his place. General Jackson said expressly in his protest to the Senate that he did not order Mr. Taney to do it, but he knew he would do it when he removed Mr. Duane and put Mr. Taney in his place. Suppose Mr. Stanton should refuse to make removals that the President may desire. I do not know that the President will ask him to make any; but suppose that such a thing should occur; that an ambitious President should desire removals of subordinates to be made. His Secretary, Mr. Stanton, declines to make those removals. He may remove Mr. Stanton without consulting the Senate as to the propriety of that removal, and put in his place a man who will make the removals he desires.

If the President can remove the Cabinet ministers, he can effect the removal of all the subordinate officers. But I am not disposed to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts as an amendment to this bill; and I regret that it has been offered. I think, however, it is a proposition that deserves a great deal of consideration, and ought to have more consideration than we can possibly give to it now and here. It ought to go before a committee and there be carefully examined. I undertook at the last session to prepare a bill, and I believe it is the first bill that was prepared on this subject, and I found that innumerable difficulties beset me on every side, and the Senator from Massachusetts will find, unless he is very careful in his legislation, that many difficulties may ensue. Some difficulties have been presented that ought to be remedied in this bill. For instance, it has been urged by the opposition to the measure, and urged with a great deal of force, that a foreign minister may die on the day of the adjournment of the Senate, and it may be very important to have the place filled, but under this bill it cannot be. A very simple amendment might be framed which in my judgment would remedy that difficulty and which the President could not abuse. The amendment I would make to meet that case would be a provision that a vacancy should be presumed to exist at the time when actual notice of the existence of the vacancy came to the knowledge of the President. In drafting the bill to which I have alluded I inserted a provision of that sort. I think it ought to be in this measure, and if it be inserted, the only objection I have heard urged against the bill will have been removed. I have said, Mr. President, all that I desired to say.

Mr. McDUGALL. It seems to me, Mr. President, that there is a disposition to abandon altogether the principles of our system of government and the ideas which were thought by its framers to be incorporated into the Constitution of the United States and the organization upon which they undertook to establish a republic of States. It seems to me that gentlemen have forgotten that the most important lesson which was studied in that day was this: that there should be three distinct powers in the Government, and that these three powers should be carefully, honestly, and loyally maintained intact—a pure judiciary, not to be maligning by the press and not to be assailed by Congress, either in this or in the other Hall or from the presidential chair; a President, clothed with his high office to discharge all the functions belonging to him properly as administering, as the Chief Executive, the Government of the Republic; and the law-making power, to which Congress belongs, and we are not to be interfered with either by the judiciary or by the Executive; and each branch of the Government independent in itself.

Among the early fears of the founders of the republic was the fear of usurpation by one class of officers over the other. And where did they locate their apprehension? Was it with the Executive? No; he was a single man; he had no immediate relation to the popular voice. Was it with the judiciary, sitting silently to hear causes and adjudge them? No, it was in the law-making power, consisting of the House of Representatives, coming directly from the people, a stormy, noisy, quarrelsome, beligerent crowd, and the Senate of the United States, supposed to be an assemblage of the fathers for consultation. The different functions of Government were thus arranged, according to the best lights of the oldest antiquity, and all the lessons drawn from the example of the intermediate States down to our own time, and the lessons of the French Revolution as well.

The absolute necessity of holding each one of these three departments in its appropriate place was deemed to be one of the most necessary considerations in the discussions that led to the organization of our Government. You will find it through the debates, you will find it through the Federalist. It was illustrated by reference to the history of all the republican States that had existed in the world, where the necessity of these three powers coordinate being maintained in their respective spheres was manifested. It was then held that the danger of usurpation was on the part of the legislative power—the body of Representatives elected by the people and Senators seeking office. The Constitution provided for the judges as a great conservative power holding their terms during good behavior; the Senators next conservative; the Representatives not at all conservative. The discussion that related to that question was continued through many debates; and the necessity of a division of power between the three branches, and the independence of each branch, led to those provisions in the Constitution which were meant to secure that division and that independence.

But, sir, we have now fallen upon evil times, and we are meeting the evil that has been prophesied for us by men who have thought on these great questions and thought since this Republic was founded. Comte is probably the most learned philosopher there is now living, and his work on sociology or positive science, if you please to call it so, is the most accepted; and what does he say about us, discussing our institutions and discussing republican institutions generally? He takes up the societies of the world from the family up, away back from the days of the theocracy through all the various forms of government to monarchies, to republics, and to despotisms; and what is the evil? The evil is in the multitude of offices. For every office there are always ten aspirants, and the nine who are necessarily unsuccessful are demoralized in seeking office, and the one who gets it is demoralized after he gets out of office.

There is an evil that is patent in our institutions and has been, and it is an argument against the policy of creating offices, which seems to have been the popular notion of the day. What have we been doing here for six years past? because I will speak only of the short period I have been here. Making offices. The whole country is swarming with officers; the Treasury Department, the Post Office Department, the Land Office Department, all the various Departments are swarming with officers; and what is the result? When you walk along the principal avenue of the capital city of the United States you may safely assume that out of every ten men you meet nine men are hunters for some place in the patronage of the Government. This is an evil which is patent, and can only be corrected by stopping this practice of multiplying offices. There is the radical evil; that is the root of the thing.

But, sir, who has the power of appointment to office? A judge under our system of government has no business to appoint an officer except he be an officer of the court or subordinate to the court. We have no business to appoint an officer, unless he belongs to the Senate or the House, or is subordinate to some of the officers of Congress. To the Executive, the other department of the Government, belongs this power. We must have rules, for there is no government without rules. There must be sway even in a republic. There must be power; and it must be exercised by him who can exercise it by the right of the authority with which he is clothed, and not be challenged by every loud-mouthed talker who may get up and speak on the hustings, and threaten the Chief Executive of the United States by word of mouth or by pen and ink and paper with impeachment in our high court when it shall be organized.

These very patent evils must be corrected, and they can only be corrected by a higher moral political sense than has been brought here, either into this or the other Chamber, except it be by the chance of an accident. The President of the United States has charge of the executive business of the Government. It is his function to superintend its general business, to see that the offices are filled and well filled. Upon him rests the responsibility. By whom is he created? By the people of the United States; by their votes in a popular election. He is not an accident, although the present incumbent has been called an accidental President. It may be so in this sense that he was the Vice President and acceded to the office of President.

I did not design embarking in this discussion; but I think it well once in awhile to look back and see where our anchors were cast in 1787, and whether we are still holding ground. It has seemed to me that we are dragging our anchors, and have been for a long time past. I think it is about time to take up the anchors and take the wind by the sky-sail. I have not heard a reference to fundamental, elementary, constitutional law here for some days, and particularly not in this discussion. I have not heard a discussion of how the three coordinate branches of the Government stand according to the sense in which they were established. I say "established," but established only for a short time, only from 1787 to 1861, because establishing means both building and founding. The very foundations and the superstructure of the great edifice built by our fathers have been trembling since then. And by whose advice or authority? Wise and informed men? Men who have studied the science of government? Men who have read history? Men who have read those authors from whom the men that organized our Constitution took their lessons? No, but men who considered merely whether they could be elected to the House of Representatives or to the Senate of the United States; men who did not live above the condition of to-day; men who had not courage enough to rise above the moment; men who did not understand that a man should live as if he would live forever, and did not know what it was to die, calling himself one portion of the Infinite.

Sir, those who produced this measure and concomitant measures here may rejoice in their strength for a day. The sun may warm about them and they may grow with rapidity, and there may be moisture about their soil; but if they grow, they grow like Jonah's gourd, and they will wither in a day. I say "a day," but I will take a decade for a day.

It is thought by some that by pursuing this policy they will acquire such potential power as will establish particular local interests. Sir, we are one country. I live in the extreme West; my friend from Massachusetts lives in the extreme East; but we have got to be one always. These things have to arrange themselves and settle down into the right. There cannot long be enmity between Maine and Texas or between California and Florida. There is a strong disposition to maintain an extreme enmity, and for what purpose? For no good purpose, I think, as I stand in the presence of my Maker—no good purpose on the part of those persons who are disposed to urge that kind of controversy. I have found in a reasonable experience in this life that there are good men in all parts of the world—East, West, North and South; and in the middle region—good men everywhere. There are as good men in Boston as there are in San Francisco; but among the good men I do not rank party politicians, of which, thank God, I never was one.

I say here we should avoid all these ugly controversies, and take a lesson from a man who wrote a long time since, though it is not everybody that approves him, but what he said in this particular respect I think is orthodox: The truth lies in the mean between extremes. A man who is forty-five degrees on one side to-day and swings around to-morrow to forty-five degrees on the other side is not right; he must settle himself in place; and among the old philosophers it was said that until a man found his place where he could rest he was never right. A piece of advice was given, consequent upon that old Greek instruction, by the person who was commander of the Sun, and was called the Sun himself. He said to Phaeton, who was an intimate friend of his, "Take my car: drive it up and around the heavens; but be careful: drive it not too high or you will burn the heavenly mansion; drive it not too low or you will put the earth in ashes; not too far to the right or you will meet the constellation of the Serpent; not too far to the left or you will come in contact with the constellation Althæa: maintain the middle course; go right on. In medio tutissimus ibis." Therefore neither the mansions of heaven nor the earth were burned or destroyed. And it is in maintaining the truth between extremes that the right is justified.

I say that is perfectly applicable to this very question here pending, this undertaking to overturn the careful equipoise made by the gravest men who ever sat in council when our Constitution was formed, and who designed to leave the executive branch of power, the judiciary its own vocation, and the legislative halls their proper place, all to be respectful of each other. I have seen the time when if a gentleman of the other House was spoken of rudely in this House he was called to order by the Chair, and the same in the other House; and in the Supreme Court, if a rough word was said about a gentleman of either body of Congress the person offending was called to order immediately. This was a manifestation of the respect deemed to be due by the several branches of the Government to each other. It would be well for us to get back to those times and to think that there is something like dignity which belongs to Government. When we forget that, when that ceases to be a consideration bearing upon our minds as public officers, we may as well give up this whole scheme of a Republic, for it will be then very rotten, and very apt to drop to pieces.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Before submitting the motion that I deem it wise to submit at this time, I desire to say that in listening to the debates which have attended the deliberations of the Senate on this subject I am perhaps more impressed with its importance than that of any other question now before this body. I listened with great interest to the remarks of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Howe,] when he suggested that the Cabinet officers now excluded from the operations of this bill should be included. I desire that in the Senate, when the bill comes properly there, he should enforce the arguments that he then used and renew his motion upon that point. That, too, would answer the argument of the Senator from Maine, who finds difficulties in regard to requiring the appointments of minor officers to come before the Senate. He stated difficulties that he thought it almost impossible to surmount; but they will be surmounted I think by applying the provisions of the bill to the appointment and removal of Cabinet officers like other officers. If the Senator from Wisconsin insists upon his amendment being ingrafted, it will I think answer the difficulties which the Senator from Maine has suggested.

I believe, as I said before, that this question is more important than any other before the Senate. I believe that the question is really between a republic as existing and founded in ancient times, and as defined in the Declaration of Independence, and a system of government by rulers, whether emperors or kings or a privileged class—it is a question affecting the preservation of a republic, of liberty, of independence, of the rights of men. Questions of finance and of tariffs are of little consideration with me in comparison with a question which is to determine the perpetuity of republican institutions founded upon the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

I see before me many seats vacant. I think that the importance of the question has not been properly considered or that would hardly be so. It is important even as affecting the dignity of this body alone; and it is proper that when the Senate sends to the other House a bill affecting its own dignity, its own rights, its own privileges, it should send to that body a measure which it can stand upon, and not send an imperfect measure which I think will be the result if the bill be passed as it now stands. As it stands, it separates the heads of Departments from the general operation of the bill. Those heads of Departments have, under laws passed, for a long course of years been clothed almost with executive power in matters of appointment and removal, and therein lies the essence of this whole question. When you have established a rule that the Cabinet officers of this Government must recognize the power of the Senate, subordinate officers will be relieved from the pressure that now unman them and makes them slaves.

In consideration of these views, sir, I move, in order that the question may be further considered to-morrow, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall yield with pleasure to that motion, but I hope it will be understood that we shall be ready to stay here to-morrow till we finish this bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 16, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,] stated as the first business in order the consideration of House bill No. 548, pending at adjournment last evening, in regard to reconstruction.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand there are several gentlemen who desire to have a morning hour. I have no desire to interfere with it if this bill shall come up immediately after the morning hour, and if the morning hour shall commence immediately. I can only consent to that arrangement with the understanding that the morning hour commences now.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has now commenced, and the first business in order is the call of the committees for reports, resuming the call where it was last suspended, with the Committee for the District of Columbia.

DISTRICT COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which, being a call for executive information, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be instructed to report to the House whether any rooms are provided for the clerk of the circuit and district courts of North Carolina, and whether any legislation is necessary to secure the records of that office, and what has been the entire compensation of the marshal and clerks of that district during the last year.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to prepare and report to this House an opinion in writing respecting the necessity of obtaining any further sanction to the constitutional amendment than three fourths of the States actually represented in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. FINCK. I object.

CONVERSION OF BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. ALLISON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be hereby directed to furnish this House with the information required by the provisions of section two of chapter thirty-nine of the act of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, approved April 12, 1866.

COMMANDER AARON K. HUGHES.

Mr. WARD, of New York, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be authorized and directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint, Commander Aaron K. Hughes to the active list of the Navy.

NATIONAL LIFE AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House now resumes the call of committees for reports, and reports are in order from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. MERCUR. There was a bill pending, reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia on Friday, when the House passed from the consideration of District business for the incorporation of the National Life and Accident Insurance Company.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That bill was upon the Private Calendar and will not come up again until next Friday.

Mr. INGERSOLL. By unanimous consent it was taken from the Private Calendar and considered during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was taken up by unanimous consent on private bill day, but if there be no objection its consideration can be resumed to-day.

No objection being made, the House resumed the consideration of bill of the Senate No. 290, to incorporate the National Life and Accident Insurance Company of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When this bill was last under consideration the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] moved to add, as an amendment to this bill, the following proviso:

Provided, That the operation of this company shall be confined to the District of Columbia.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] offered the following as an amendment to the amendment:

Provided, That the operations of this company may be extended to all the States of the Union, subject to the laws of the respective States.

The pending question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

The question was put, and no quorum voted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it in order for me to say a word in support of my amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order as the House is dividing.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ALLISON and INGERSOLL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 50.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon agreeing to Mr. ALLISON's amendment as amended.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think there is some misapprehension in regard to this amendment. I offered my amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and not as an addition to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised by the Clerk that it was offered as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I intended to move to strike out the gentleman's amendment and substitute mine for it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was not the understanding.

The question was put upon agreeing to the amendment as amended; on which no quorum voted.

Mr. UPSON. I move that the bill and amendments lie upon the table.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 31, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. INGERSOLL and ALLISON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 44.

So the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF BAILIFFS AND CRIERS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the House No. 356, fixing the compensation for bailiffs and criers of the courts of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WARD, of New York. Does this bill increase the compensation of these officers?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It proposes to do so.

Mr. WARD, of New York. Then I am against it.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that the bailiff and criers who are required by the marshal or the courts of the District of Columbia to attend upon the district, circuit, or criminal court of said District shall be paid by said marshal $3 50 per day for each day's attendance, instead of two dollars as now provided by law, commencing the 1st day of January, 1866. The second section provides that so much of the act of Congress as limits the number of notaries public to thirty-five is hereby repealed, and the superior court of the District of Columbia may appoint as many as they may deem necessary for the public convenience.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ROSS. Is not this an appropriation bill? If it is it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not an appropriation bill; it is a bill to increase salaries, but the appropriation to pay that increase is not contained in this bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And if it was, I cannot see the wit of raising the point on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now call the previous question on the engrossment of the bill.

The question was taken upon seconding the call for the previous question; and upon a division, there were—ayes 38, noes 23; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed Messrs. INGERSOLL and ECKLEY to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 71, noes 26.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now call the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The question was taken upon seconding the call for the previous question; and upon a division, there were—ayes 28, noes 29; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed

Messrs. INGERSOLL and DEFREES to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes fifty-six; noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 177) to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with sundry amendments, House bill No. 907, to amend the law of the District of Columbia, with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that no appeal shall be allowed from the judgment of a justice of the peace unless the appellant, with sufficient surety or sureties, approved by the justice, enter into an undertaking to satisfy and pay the final judgment of the appellate court.

The second section provides that when such undertaking has been entered into the justice shall immediately file the original papers, including a copy of his docket entries, in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia; and thereupon, as soon as the appellant shall have made the deposit for costs required by law or obtained leave from one of the justices or from the court to prosecute his appeal without a deposit, the clerk shall docket the cause and shall issue a summons for the appellee to appear at the next trial term of the court, and thereafter the cause shall be proceeded with in the manner prescribed by the act of March 1, 1823, to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the recovery of debts in the District of Columbia, except that the appellant need not file a petition as directed by said act.

The third section provides that if the appellant fails to prosecute his appeal the appellee may, upon making the aforesaid deposit for costs, have the cause docketed and move for affirmance of the justice's judgment, or he may have a trial of the case upon its merits.

The fourth section provides that there shall be no supersedeas or stay of execution of the judgments of the supreme court of the District of Columbia otherwise than by injunction.

The fifth section provides that mutual debts between the parties to an action, or between the testator or intestate of both parties, or either party, may be set off against each other by plea in bar, whether the said debts be of the same or a different nature; and if either debt arose by reason of a penalty, the exact sum to be set off shall be stated in the plea.

The sixth section provides that the plea of set-off may be: "That the plaintiff, at the commencement of the suit, was, and still is indebted to the defendant in the sum of ——— dollars, for ———, as appears by the particulars of the said debt, hereunto annexed; and he is willing that the same may be set off against the plaintiff's demand." And upon the trial of an issue upon said plea, judgment shall be for the balance found due, whether to the plaintiff or defendant, with costs. Mutual judgments recovered in said court may be set off against each other, on motion of either party; and the court shall award execution for the balance found due against the party chargeable therewith.

The seventh section provides that publication may be substituted for personal service of process upon any defendant who cannot be found, in suits for partition, divorce, by attachment, for the foreclosure of mortgages and deeds of trust, and for the enforcement of mechanics' liens and all other liens against real or personal property, and in all actions at law or in equity which have for their immediate object the enforcement or establishment of any lawful right, claim, or demand to or against any real or personal property within the jurisdiction of the court.

The eighth section provides that no order for the substitution of publication for personal service shall be made till a summons for the defendant shall have been issued and returned "not to be found." And when an order for publication shall be made, it shall be in the following or equivalent form:

In the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the ——— day of ———, 18— A B, plaintiff, vs. C D, defendant. (At law.) (In equity.) No. ——— On motion of the plaintiff, by Mr. ——— his attorney, it is ordered that the defendant cause his appearance to be entered herein on or before the first rule day occurring forty days after this day; otherwise the cause will be proceeded with as in case of default.

The ninth section provides that all sales duly made in cases in which publication is substituted for personal service of process, shall be good and valid, and shall vest any purchaser with a perfect title.

The tenth section provides that the proceeding to enforce any lien shall be by bill or petition in equity, and the decree, besides subjecting the thing upon which the lien has attached to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's demand against the defendant, shall adjudge that the plaintiff recover his demand against the defendant, and that he may have execution thereof as at law.

The eleventh section provides that in actions against foreign corporations doing business in the District of Columbia all process may be served on the agent of such corporation or person conducting its business aforesaid, and such service shall be effectual to bring the corporation before the court.

The twelfth section provides that all laws and parts of laws in conflict with these provisions are repealed.

The first amendment reported from the committee was to add to section four "or upon proceedings in error to the Supreme Court of the United States." So that the section as amended, would read as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be no supersedeas or stay of execution of the judgments of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, otherwise than by injunction, or upon proceedings in error to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert in section eleven, after the words "corporation or person conducting its business aforesaid," the words "or, in case he is absent or cannot be found, by leaving a copy thereof at the principal place of business in the District;" so that the section as amended will read as follows:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That in actions against foreign corporations doing business in the District of Columbia, all process may be served on the agent of such corporation or person conducting its business aforesaid, or, in case he is absent or cannot be found, by leaving a copy thereof at the principal place of business in the District, and such service shall be effectual to bring the corporation before the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after section eleven the following as additional sections:

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the power claimed and exercised, as of common right, by every landlord, of seizing by his own authority the personal chattels of his tenant for rent arrears, is hereby abolished; and, instead of it, the landlord shall have a tacit lien upon such of the tenant's personal chattels, upon the premises, as are subject to execution for debt, to commence with the tenancy and continue for three months after the rent is due and until the termination of any action for such rent, brought within said three months, and this lien may be enforced, first, by attachment, to be issued upon affidavit that the rent is due and unpaid, or, if not due, that the defendant is about to remove the same or some of said chattels; or, second, by attachment against the tenant and execution, to be levied on said chattels, or any of them, in whosever hands they may be found; or, third, by action against any purchaser of any of said chattels, with notice of the lien; in which action the plaintiff may have judgment for the value of the chattels purchased by the defendant, but not exceeding the rent arrear and damages.
